Grange, Grocers Study Bread Production Cost

Practically everyone eats bread. As a nation we consume an estimated 40 million loaves a day and that is a lot of bread. Bread is a highly perishable product. Putting a loaf of bread together is a complex and complicated business that calls for the services (among others) of farmers and producers of raw materials, of millers to grind the flour, of bakers, and finally our great transportation systems to carry the bread to retailers and consumers.

The National Grange and Grocery Manufacturers of America, Inc., recently made a joint study of all the elements entering into the cost of a loaf of bread. They found that the farmer received 19.6% of the bread dollar and the other 80% represented the cost of the numerous complex manufacturing and delivery functions required to transform wheat, soy beans, cottonseed oil, sugar cane, sugar beets and other ingredients into the ultra fresh loaf on the grocer's shelves.

Thirty-seven and one-tenth percent (or 5.5c) goes into wages and salaries. On the other hand, in 1950, the total profits of all the manufacturers and distributors combined were only 1c on the retail loaf price, the study showed.

The modern family uses two to four times as much hot water as a comparable family of 20 years ago, according to the Gas Appliance Manufacturers Association.
