

Tug Working on Stranded Schooner

Bandon, Ore. — (U.P.) — A big commercial tug used its powerful pumps Tuesday in an effort to lift the stricken lumber schooner Cynthia Olson from the Coquille river channel near here.

The Coast Guard turned the job over to a private firm, although the cutter Bonham was standing by.

The Olson grounded Saturday night at the end of the north jetty when she was leaving the harbor with a load of lumber. Later, the Bonham and a tug pulled the vessel 800 feet toward port where she again grounded as water filled the engine room through a hole in her side.

Salvage workers plan to patch up the ship after it is pulled free and docked. It then will be towed to Portland or San Francisco for drydocking. The vessel was not in immediate danger, and her 28-man crew stayed aboard.

Molasses Building Blocks Used To Erect Workshop

Southport, N. C. — (U.P.) — Dietitians may frown on black-strap molasses but George W. Rappleyea keeps boosting it. He says it's a fine building material.

The former vice president of the Higgins boat works at New Orleans has used his own molasses building blocks to erect his workshop in this tiny fishing village.

The inside floors and walls are finished with a smooth, linoleum-like surface material made with molasses. The driveway to the shop is surfaced with a molasses-base paving.

Flys and ants don't swarm around such construction, Rappleyea said. Not only that, but the building block are repugnant to termites, he added. Not Messy, He Says

Molasses in its natural state is messy to work with but the basic construction compound he makes with it is not, Rappleyea said. The semi-liquid is concentrated, powered and then made into Plas-Mo-Falt.

A five-room house can be built for no more than $1,000 by using the concentrate, Rappleyea said. That figure doesn't include the cost of wiring and plumbing.

The concentrate is mixed with a heavy residual bunker fuel oil, clay and sand to make strong, plastic building blocks. To make a stucco or smooth inside or outside finish for buildings, the concentrate and fuel oil are mixed with water and mixed with some chemicals (unnamed) into a fluid that can be applied with a spray gun.

The homeowner could build his own driveway for less than $30, the inventor added, by mixing the molasses base formula with fuel oil and sand to make a synthetic asphalt.

That process interests the Navy, Rappleyea said, because 40 barrels of his compound, mixed with a ship's fuel oil and
