

Eisenhower Would Use T-H Law As Preventive in Steel Dispute

New York — (U.P.) — Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower said Thursday that if he were President he would invoke the Taft-Hartley law in the steel dispute.

"From what I know, if I had to do it, I would have invoked the law," he said. "I would have done everything possible to put off the strike another 80 days."

The retired general made the statement in talking with New Jersey Republicans whose support he sought for the GOP presidential nomination.

The group of about 75 met with Eisenhower shortly after a similar session with Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio, his principal rival for the nomination.

In discussing the steel dispute, during a question and answer period, Eisenhower stressed that he has been out of the country, and is not completely familiar with all the laws which apply to labor-management strife and the facts behind the steel issue.

But, he said, steel is vital to the buildup of Allied strength and the troops in Korea and he would have done everything in his power to prevent a stoppage of production.

The New Jersey group asked Eisenhower many questions on domestic and foreign affairs during their hour-long meeting.

No Answer to Korea
His responses included: Korea — He had "no definite answer" on how it could be settled quickly but he should build up the Korean troops to the point where they could hold any aggression until the disposable forces of the United States could be brought into action.

Yalta and Potsdam — "I participated in no political decisions during the war — I did voluntarily give my opinion on one or two things. It was not accepted."

Forced to Retreat
Western Germany — The division was agreed upon although he opposed it before he made his last attack in World War II and "I was forced to retreat 150 miles to get back inside the area picked by politicians as the place we should be."

Taxes and spending — He said that once the nation achieves a program which promises real peace and security it should strive for "not merely the 10 per cent that has been talked about" but to cut by $30,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000 below the present $85,000,000,000 budget with tax relief according to.
