Actor Bill Ball To Dance, Direct In Festival Plays

Ashland — The performance by a dancing drama student in the 1952 festival may well prove to be one of the entertainment highlights of the event, which is to open in Ashland's Elizabethan like theater on August 1. Bill Ball, a young drama student from Carnegie Tech in Pittsburgh, captivated festival audiences last year with his dancing performance on the festival stage railing in "Twelfth Night."

This year, he again has an opportunity to dance. He has been cast as Ariel in "The Tempest."

But festival directors, wishing to fully utilize the actor's terpsichorean ability, has made him dance director for two of the plays and for a group, which will do pre-show performances as a part of the "Tudor Fair."

This fair, which originally was called the "Mop Fair," is to be presented again this year under the direction of the festival auxiliary group, the Tudor Guild.

The fair will add color to the unique festival with souvenir and refreshment booths inside the walls of the amphitheatre in which the festival is presented.

The pre-show dancers will number eight and will entertain festival audiences with pre-curtain performances.

Also lending a background to the festival will be madrigal singers and instrumentalists, performing under the direction of Hans Lampi, a University of Southern California music professor, who is a student of Elizabethan music.

The festival will open in Ashland August 1 and run through August 30. The four plays, "The Tempest," "Henry V," "Much Ado About Nothing," and "Julius Caesar" will be presented in rotation.
