

Gage Receives Satisfaction In Doing Good for Old Folks

One of the positive pleasures that goes with recognizing valuable pieces is the good you can often do for helpless old people. Their heart-felt thanks can be abiding. For example, first let me tell you how I made you $886 for an old lady.

I was walking down the street when I recognized this little old woman's home. Her husband was long ago dead, her children dispersed. As with most elderly, neglected folk, she was delighted to have a caller and in her forthright way told me: "See here, Mr. Gage, I am of your column reading every day. But yet, what do you say? Never of things which I myself own."

I responded: "Would you mind if I'd snoop around a little, after all, I'd like some column fodder."

Everything was quite ordinary and I was about to give up my search for treasure when I saw a little 8-inch high French clock on a closet shelf. She apologized for the dust as she wiped it off with her apron.

"This is an old clock, Mr. FROST'S POETRY BOOK SAID VALUABLE

It is a common complaint that the grass only looks greener in the next pasture and really isn't.

And while this is probably true for most cows and a lot of people, including poets, it apparently did not prove so for Robert Frost, considered by many to be the finest poet America has produced so far in this century.

For Frost—and regardless of the rank you grant him, he has won the Pulitzer prizes for poetry, 1924 and 1930—had his first two books published in England.

In other words, this native San Franciscan who has lived most of his life in the East and who has turned out enough poetry to fill a freightcar, almost, was accepted by the British well before his countrymen would give him a break.

How much money he has made out of his poetry is another matter. But whatever it is, it hasn't been enough to start many writers turning out verse in the hope of making a living out of it. The general impression is that writing poetry is still a luxury, still practically worthless when it comes to turning an honest dollar in quantity.

Prince Edward Island national park has four main beaches.

There's a point to look for in the American first edition, though. It's in the last line on Page 14. It consists of the word "and," a mistake for the conjunction "and."

Harking back to my grammar days, I shouldn't end a sentence with "and" much less a paragraph, so I've added these few words to end this column with.

Nonetheless, there is money in poetry if you recognize it when you see it, and Frost's poetry is a good example.

Take his first book, published in London. The name of it is "A Boy's Will." It is dated London, 1913.

If you come across a copy with that date, and it is bound in pebbled bronze cloth, you have an item that is worth all the way up to $380.

But if your copy doesn't have that binding and is bound in white parchment, stamped in red; or has buff wrappers stamped in black with an A bearing a horizontal rule; or just a plain A—don't feel too badly about it.

The book is still worth a fair amount, from $10 up, say.

Furthermore, the first American edition—once the English had brought out the book, the Americans quickly got onto it—bearing the date line New York, 1915, has a value ranging up to $35.
