Advisers Will Check Economic Pulse

Washington — (U.P.) — The administration is quietly setting up an informal network of advisers throughout the country to keep a close check on the nation's economic pulse.

The plan is to get businessmen, college professors and other unofficial experts to report to Washington regularly on economic conditions and the way Eisenhower programs are being received in their areas.

As one official put it privately: "We hope in this way to spot problems and irritations before they can cause real trouble for the administration and the country."
