Reconstructed Wood Now Being Used for Making of Furniture

Chicago — (U.P.)—Furniture makers are using "reconstructed" wood made from small chips and shavings for fancy furniture.

The Chicago Market Daily, Furniture Mart, said improved machines and formulas have made it possible for the industry to offer the newly processed materials.

The "reconstructed" wood is being made into bedroom case goods, occasional tables, chests and even frames for upholstered furniture.

Sometimes the boards are used as they come from the machines with a stain, varnish or painted finish. Others are used as core stock for laminating with the finest face veneers used on expensive furniture.

Machines used in the process mix wood chips, shavings, and a limited amount of sawdust and wood flour with resins and a catalyst, press it into shape, or pour it out in one continuous board.

One firm is making painted bedroom furniture entirely of the material. Another hopes to develop better and less expensive upholstered furniture using the reconstructed wood for frames.
