LEGAL NOTICES

Philadelphia (U-P)—A Philadelphia lawyer who worked as an aviation mechanic while studying law hopes to combine both occupations and become an expert on determining legal ownership of the air.

The attorney, James A. Jennings, points out that the field of territorial rights in the air is a recent development that poses a profound problem in international law.

One problem which he said has been kicking around for several years is which nation owns the air over the North and South Poles. And he said the question has remained unanswered since trans-ocean flights.

Jennings, a 29-year-old veteran of World War II, divides his time between his books, his work at International Airport here and his wife and two children. But his chief goal is to resolve the question who owns what part of the air.
