Hurricanes Cause Of Big Upset in American Birdlife

Boston — (U.P.) — Hummingbirds were buzzing about six miles at sea and storm-weary ocean birds were resting on inland lawns after New England's late-summer hurricanes this year.

The two severe storms—Carol and Edna—caused the biggest upset in American birdlife since the bald eagle bought a toupee.

On land, sea and air, the Audubon Society began counting feathers to determine how our winged friends had fared in the big blows.

"There was a tremendous loss of bird life," the society reported sadly.

Some birds—like the robins—got out of it okay. They "sensed" the storms and made for the ground—clinging bushes and thickets where the wind was weakest.

Other birds don't seem to have that strange gift of sensing forthcoming catastrophes. Those got hit hard.

The storm caught them in their southern habitats, blowing them ahead into the strange hinterlands of the North. Birds from South Carolina were warbling in rebel accents over Yankee beaches.

Other bewildered birds were caught at sea on their annual emigrations southward. They were buffeted mercilessly. The luckiest were driven ashore. A fortunate few rode it out on the monstrous waves. But generally, they died by the thousands.

The society sent out scores of bird-watchers to survey the damage. All along the New England coast, they reported strange birds wandering around, spent and dazed. Some were so feeble, you could walk about the sand dunes and pick them up at will.

All in all, the Society reported the birds comparatively suffered a lot more than humans. They lost more lives and more homes—and none of them had insurance.

Dam Damage Check By Television Plan
Ephrata, Wash. — (U.P.) — Bureau of Reclamation engineers will use television tomorrow to check damage at the base of Grand Coulee dam by water pouring over the spillway.

The idea belongs to Harold Maiken, a deep sea diver for a Seattle firm which has this year's contract to make the annual inspection of the "bucket" or foot of the world's mightiest dam.

At low water time annually a diver is sent down to check erosion damage and report his findings to government engineers. They must rely on his report to determine what repairs must be made.

This year, however, a camera will be lowered and the diver will focus it on the bucket. The picture will be relayed by cable to the engineers who will be able to see for themselves what needs to be done.

Sandy Steelhead Study Slated by Fisheries
Portland — (U.P.) — Plans for a detailed study of steelhead migration into the Sandy River have been revealed by State Fisheries Director M. T. Hoy.

Hoy said the study will be conducted this winter by the State Game Commission and the Oregon Fish Commission. The investigations will be made primarily to determine how many steelhead enter the Sandy and how many of the sea-going rainbows are caught by sport fishermen.

Under the study, fish will be trapped and tagged in the lower Sandy, and then allowed to continue upstream. Surveys will be made to locate tagged fish in sport catches and on spawning grounds, in order to estimate the percentage of steelhead entering the river and the percentage of those taken by anglers.

Hillsboro — (U.P.) — The body of John J. Tomlinson, 85, of Cedar Mill was found in a ravine near Bonny Slope yesterday by a 100-man search party of Multnomah county sheriff's reserves and Washington county sheriff's deputies.

Glow From Outside of Whiskey Bottle Possible
Louisville, Ky. — (U.P.) — A U. S. revenue agent reveals that a glow can come from the outside of a whiskey bottle as well as from its contents.

Agent Paul J. Tarter testified at a court hearing that whiskey bottles are sometimes marked with fluorescent crayon to guard against taverns serving liquor from re-filled bottles. Agents check the bottle with an ultraviolet-ray flashlight and, if the level of whiskey is higher than the "glow," a tavern operator is in trouble.

Vote in Berlin Hits Red-Nazi Hope
Berlin — (U.P.) — West Berlin Socialists captured 64 of the 127 seats in the city's Parliament today, crushing Communist and Nazi-tainted rightist hopes of getting a foothold in the city government.

The anti-rearmament Socialists retained their position as the city's strongest party and ousted a right wing coalition from power.

But West Berlin's Christian Democrats, in winning 44 seats, made sweeping gains in Sunday's elections to assure themselves of representation in a new Socialist-Democrat coalition.

A record total of 1,554,766 voters turned out for the election and gave the Socialists 684,646 or 44 per cent. Christian Democrats received 466,595 votes, or 30 per cent, at the expense of the moderate rightist Free Democrats, their chief coalition partners in Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's federal government.

Although election issues concerned such national controversies as West German rearmament, yesterday's voting was purely a local affair which will have no repercussions against Adenauer's Bonn government.
