SCIENCE AT WORK

New York—(U.P.)—Dr. Stephen Sargent Visher, professor of geography at Indiana University, will qualify as the man of the year with many people. He has done something about the weather.

What he has done is to put together 1,031 composite weather maps with the years-long data collected by weather bureau observers which — since they're based upon average or normals — tell you what to expect.

In his "Climatic Atlas of the United States," newly published by the Harvard University Press, he recalled that the late Isaiah Bowman once remarked that "facts more valuable than all the gold of the Klondike lie buried in the weather bureau's climatological records."

His effort was to mine the weather gold. Of his 1,031 maps, 371 deal with temperature in bewildering detail from annual, seasonal, monthly, and even weekly temperatures, to killing frosts, cold waves, hot waves, and house-heating requirements from coast to coast.

Four Coastal Types Winds, atmospheric pressure and storms take up 59 maps; sunshine needs only 20. Thirty-six maps take care of atmospheric humidity, but 540 are needed for his divisions, subdivisions, and sub-sub-divisions of precipitation — rain, snow, and hail.

In an introduction to the maps, he summarized their contents. A summary of this summary is that "although the climatic diversity of the United States is great, the climate of most of the country consists of one or another of the several sub-types of one major climatic type, the Continental."

This is the three-fourths of the country between the two coastal mountain ranges. He divided what remains into four types of coastal weather — the California or dry subtropical "Mediterranean" type, the Marine or Oregon" type, the "humid subtropical or modified

Whipping Post May Be On Way Out in Delaware

Delaware, Del. (U.P.)—The whipping post—one of the few holdovers of colonial forms of punishment still remaining in this country—may be on its way out in Delaware.

A proposal to abolish the whipping post, still a legal form of punishment in the state, probably will come up at the opening term of the state legislature. The Democratic party, which included abolition of the cat-o-nine-tails punishment in their victorious campaign at the last election, has enough votes to push it through.

However, the anti-whipping plank has been included in both the Republican and Democratic platforms as a matter of course during recent years, but there has been no well-organized efforts to kill the penalty in the legislature.

The measure came up for vote on several occasions but was defeated each time, frequently by a narrow margin. Most of the opposition to the whipping post came from influences outside the state which branded the punishment inhumane.

24 Offenses In Delaware, however, many residents believe the whipping post is the best crime deterrent possible. They point out, for example, that the state is singularly untroubled by highway robberies for which whipping up to 40 lashes is compulsory.

The whip may be ordered for 23 other offenses at the discretion of the courts, including breaking and entering, forgery, wife-beating and pick-pocketing. However, whippings are rather rare. But there is a common belief that the threat of the whipping post is as effective as the lash itself.

Each of the three county prisons in the state has a whipping post in its yard. The yard is opened to the public under the law when a whipping takes place, but usually only a handful of witnesses appear.

The prisoner is stripped to the waist and manacled to the post for the whipping. The warden is directed to "lay them on well" but to hold his whip arm straight, which tends to lessen the force of the blow.
