Man's Explorations During 1954 Probe Skies, Oceans, Mountains

Washington—In the endless quest to broaden knowledge of the earth, sea and sky, explorers made far-reaching discoveries and attained new records in 1954.

Indications that Mars is a living planet with simple vegetation marked the end of a six-month astronomical expedition sponsored by the National Geographic Society and Lowell Observatory of Flagstaff, Arizona, the Society noted today in its annual year-end summary of major geographic achievements.

New Mars Photos Dr. E. C. Slipher returned from Bloemfontein, South Africa, with 20,000 new photographs of Mars that clearly showed its great blue-green markings, gleaming polar caps, frost areas, swirling clouds and dust storms.

Mars in 1954 made its closest approach to the earth in 13 years. Scientists in 18 observatories around the world gauged temperatures on Mars, measured its diameter more accurately and made other observations for the International Mars Committee.

Progress on Palomar On Palomar Mountain, California, astronomers completed their best season's work on the monumental Sky Survey sponsored by the Society and the California Institute of Technology. It was disclosed that the first section of the Survey's atlas of the universe, now six years in the making, will be published in 1956.

Observers discovered a new minor planet on Dec. 5. This was the latest addition to the Survey's mounting list of new asteroids, comets, nebulosities and star clusters.

As the 48-inch "Big Schmidt" phototelescope and 200-inch Hale telescope unfolded secrets of the universe, man probed deeper into the sea.

On Feb. 15, two French naval officers made a record descent of 13,287 feet in a bathyscaphe off the coast of Dakar, French West Africa. They beat by 2,948 feet the previous record set by Swiss Professor Auguste Piccard in 1953.

In September, two French cave explorers descended 2,495 feet in the Berger Cave near Grenoble, France, setting a new world's record for exploration in a natural underground cavern.

Spurred by the 1953 conquest of Mt. Everest, at 29,028 feet the world's tallest summit, climbers from 11 countries challenged other peaks in the Himalayas.

A team of Italian mountaineers battled to the top of 28,

250-foot Godwin Austen (K2), second highest mountain, on July 31. A British group reconnoitered Kanchenjunga (28,166 feet), the world's third tallest peak and the loftiest unscaled mountain.

An Austrian expedition conquered Cho Oyu (28,667 feet), seventh highest peak. A Frenchwoman who tried Cho Oyu with a Swiss team reportedly reached 25,496 feet, a record for a woman climber.

In the Arctic, two United States icebreakers made a historic journey in August. They pierced, for the first time, the formidable M'Clure Strait that connects the Arctic Ocean with Viscount Melville S o u n d. M'Clure Strait is a western entrance of the famous Northwest Passage that has been navigated through other routes.

Underwater Divide Russian scientists reported finding a vast underwater divide between the New Siberian Islands and Greenland. The scientists said their research program, started in 1948, had established there never was a north polar land mass.

Members of a United States Canadian survey expedition found and used food and equipment left behind more than 45 years ago by Rear Admiral Robert E. Peary, who discovered the North Pole.

Another expedition led by a Jesuit priest of Boston College reported that it localized the North Magnetic Pole in a triangle on the northwest end of Prince of Wales Island. The Magnetic Pole has shifted about 150 miles west and slightly south of the position established in 1946.

A British expedition completed a two-year study in north Greenland. The explorers said seismic soundings established that ice in north Greenland extends at places to a depth of 10,000 feet, although the ice cap is becoming smaller.
