Denial Sought for Hells Canyon Motion

Washington — (U.P.) — The Idaho Power Co. and staff counsel for the Federal Power commission yesterday asked the agency to deny a motion to dismiss the utility company's application to build three low dams in the Hells Canyon reach of the Snake river.

Mrs. Evelyn Cooper, attorney for advocates of a high federal dam at Hells Canyon, asked the FPC on Dec. 23 to dismiss Idaho Power's application on the grounds that recommendations of the company and the agency's legal staff "proposed major departures from the record in favor of new and indefinite proposals."

Idaho Power said the motion was "frivolous," and sought only "to confuse the issue." John C. Mason, FPC staff counsel, said he could not agree to Mrs. Cooper's motion.

The commission is expected to rule on Mrs. Cooper's motion within a few days.

Small H-Bomb War Could Doom Mankind

Champaign, Ill. — (U.P.) — Two scientists warned that a "small" hydrogen bomb war could spell the certain doom of mankind within 1,000 years.

Dr. Eugene Rabinowitch and Dr. Henry Quastler, both of the University of Illinois, said in a joint statement Monday that the H-bomb's effects on heredity could thus begin the "creeping suicide" of the human race.

Quastler, a physiologist, said the generation alive at the time of the H-bomb war might survive, "and its children and its children."

"But the eventual fate of mankind would have been sealed and nothing could be done about it," he said.

Quastler said it is not yet known how much H-bomb radiation it takes to seriously affect heredity — "but we do know that radioactivity would have some effect."

Economic Status Of Aged Women Said Improving

One of the tragedies of this generation is that unattached elderly women are less well-off financially than other older persons. However, there is ample evidence that the economic status of women over 65 is gradually improving, according to the Institute of Life Insurance.

Figures based on the Bureau of the Census reports indicate that some 1 1/2 million aged women have no regular income of their own. This includes widowed and single women who make up about one-third of the 4 1/2 million "non-married" women over 65. By contrast, only eight per cent of elderly men are without money income.

The contrast in means between older men and women with some regular income is just as striking. The typical income of women over 65 is something more than $650 a year, but men over 65 receive nearly $1250 annually.

Well over 13 million persons today are over the age of 65. They include 4 million married couples with at least one partner over 65; about 2 million men, mostly widowers; and the 4 1/2 million women mentioned. These add up to what can be called 10 1/2 million "family units." Less than one-quarter of these family units have no regular income.

Although older persons probably prefer to live independently, surprisingly enough one out of three without regular income live in their own households.

Most of the others live with relatives or board elsewhere, and about 10 per cent are in institutions.

It may be true that a person can manage with less income as he grows older and his family responsibilities have decreased. Nevertheless an individual of any age does need some cash income, except of course in the relatively rare instance where he can draw on his capital. The alternative—which many elderly people are forced to adopt—is to borrow money, perhaps by mortgaging a home, to raise some of the food needed (feasible on a farm) or to ask others for help, never a pleasant experience.

But the picture of the future is definitely brighter. Many younger people living today will reach their 65th birthdays with far greater assurance of having regular incomes than did their parents. Social security promises an income to those who are covered. Moreover, the vast growth of annuities, pension plans insured by life insurance companies, other pension plans, and life insurance itself are contributing substantially to present and future retirement income.
