Problem of Teacher Recruitment To Be Discussed by Educators

The public is invited to attend a panel discussion on the subject, "Techniques in Teacher Recruitment," to be held at the Medford Lincoln school gymnasium, Thursday, January 13, at 8 p.m. The panel is being sponsored by the members of Epsilon chapter of the Delta Kappa Gamma sorority, a national honorary society for women teachers.

Some suggestions for a solution to the problem of teacher shortage will be discussed by the panel made up of persons in Medford and Ashland considered to be outstanding in the field of education.

According to the best current estimates, it is statistically impossible to obtain enough qualified teachers to staff schools in this country fully in any one year between now and 1964. In 1952 teacher trainees made up more than one-third of all college graduates. The demand for new teachers, however, equalled 64 percent of all college graduates of that year.

The Oregon School Facilities survey which was initiated in 1951 by the state department of education and completed in 1954 found that by 1960 Oregon would need a new building covering 189 acres to house its increased school population of 90,115 new students. The number of new teachers required to staff this building adequately would be 3,609.

The teachers have posed four possibilities in regard to the recruiting problem which will be discussed by the panel. They are, 1, getting along with fewer teachers, 2, recruiting more, 3, keeping only the best, or 4, measuring quality.

Other topics to be discussed are "What is wrong with teaching?" "Is it not attractive?" "Are certification requirements too high?"
