Robots Operate Production Lines at TV-Radio Factory Without Coffee Break

Harvard, Ill. — (U.P.) — Robots are running production lines here with never a pause for a coffee break.

They are ushering in the "age of automation" at plants of one of the large television manufacturers.

The robots are at work here on TV sets and clock radios, and they do their jobs with speed and accuracy no human being could match. But now and then a robot gets off its feed and a human being has to straighten it out.

The Admiral Corp. plant here has two robot production lines, one for TV and the other for clock radios.

Twenty-three robots on the TV line insert 44 component parts into a TV chassis board in about 3 1/2 minutes. A completed board forms about half a television chassis.

The robots can turn out 250 boards an hour or 2200 in an eight hour day.

Different Tasks — Powered by compressor air and controlled by electronics, the robots work in unison although each performs a different task. They hiss as their compressed air is released, then they stamp their assigned parts into position.

It's that way all day long, hiss, stamp, hiss, stamp.

The robots don't look like their comic strip counterparts. They have no hands or feet. They have no head, either, but that's why they're called "heads."

Actually, the robots or "heads" look like what they are—automatically controlled stamping machines.

The robots are stationed at regular intervals along a 45-foot track. Beneath each robot is a relay box with a red light which glows when ever that particular machine is jammed.

That happens once in awhile when the robot is fed an irregularly shaped part it can't digest. Master Brain at Head of Line

At the head of the line is a "master brain," an electronic system that controls all the "heads."

The chassis boards on which the robots perform their tasks are bakelite slabs measuring 9 by 5 1/4 inches with TV circuits "printed" on them in copper.

The boards move along the track, stopping under each robot. The robot inserts its assigned part or parts, and the board moves along to the next robot.

Parts inserted include 36 resistors, two condensers and six wire jumpers.

The clock radio line has 18 robots which grind out complete chassis boards including a condenser, four resistors, eight wire jumpers and five tube sockets.

It would be hard to say how many people the robots have "replaced." Production has increased so much since the robots were installed here last July that the human working force has doubled.

And the human workers have to hustle to keep pace with the robots.

McClellan anticipates no trouble from McCarthy. "If he is sincere, and I always ascribed to him absolute sincerity in his opposition to Communism, I would assume he would try to work with the committee," McClellan said.

McCarthy, in a stormy Senate debate last week, accused some Democrats of insincerity in agreeing to continue investigating Communism.

Replaces McCarthy — The Arkansasian will head the Senate Investigating Subcommittee, formerly headed by Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy (R-Wis.).

The group might also reopen McCarthy's controversial investigation of alleged espionage at the Army's Fort Monmouth, N.J. secret radar center, McClellan said.

Heads Parent Group — The Arkansasian will head the Senate Government Operations Committee, parent of the investigating subcommittee, as well as the inquiry group.

Asked if he agreed with Sen. Charles E. Potter (R-Mich.) that Stevens and Adams should resign, McClellan said, "If I had some responsibility, there'd be some action taken." He did not elaborate.

Strikes in Camps — Nobel said there had been strikes in the slave labor camps following the arrest of Soviet Secret Police Chief Lavrenti Beria.

Hundreds of prisoners were shot down, he said, as the strikes were broken. He said that in a camp near his, prisoners congregated at the gates and refused to return to work in the mines.

"Eight hundred guards began to fire," he said, "and shot until the last one was laying on the ground." He said 110 were killed outright and 500 to 600 wounded.

Wall Street — New York — (U.P.) — Stocks suffered one of their worst breaks since Korea in an active session today.

Two forces induced selling — one a Federal Reserve move to stiffen interest rates and make bonds more attractive than stocks, and second, the President's budget message which indicated lower government spending and no further corporation tax relief.

Prices of stocks fell 1 to more than 4 points. Trading increased on the decline.

MEDFORD (OREGON) MAIL TRIBUNE—SEVEN

Stevens, Adams May Be Called in New Peress Probe

Washington — (U.P.) — Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.) said Sunday night he expects to summon Army Secretary Robert T. Stevens and Army counselor John G. Adams in a new investigation of the celebrated "Peress Case."

McClellan was sharply critical of the Army's role in the case of Maj. Irving Peress, New York dentist who was promoted and later honorably discharged, despite his refusal to answer loyalty questions.

Replaces McCarthy — The Arkansasian will head the Senate Investigating Subcommittee, formerly headed by Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy (R-Wis.).

The group might also reopen McCarthy's controversial investigation of alleged espionage at the Army's Fort Monmouth, N.J. secret radar center, McClellan said.
