As We Live

Broken Troth Better Than Unhappy Marriage

There are times when it is better to break an engagement than to go through with a marriage that is doomed to failure from the start.

(Q) "Last winter my daughter became engaged to a young man whom she had known in college. We announced her engagement in our local paper and gave a party for her and her fiance when the announcement was made. They planned to be married last September but kept putting off the date. During the summer she spent two weeks visiting his parents, and when she came home she was very vague about when they were to be married. Finally she admitted that she had broken her engagement but asked us not to discuss it outside the family. Now I am always being asked by my friends when our daughter is going to be married. I don't know just what to say or how to handle this problem. Will you please give me some advice?"

Since the engagement was announced formally, its termination should also be announced. Simply send a notice to your your local paper to the effect that: "The engagement of Miss So-and-So and Mr. So-and-So has been terminated by mutual consent," with the request that it be printed in the society news items.

Chances are that most of your friends will see the notice or will hear about it from mutual friends. There will unquestionably be a lot of speculation about the reason for the break, but this will be behind your back and you will not have to answer questions.

Dr. Hurlock

Your friends and your daughter's will mention to you and to her how sorry they are that things did not "work out" for her. The more curious may even ask why she broke the engagement. Your answer should be the simple statement, "They fortunately discovered in time that they were not meant for each other." Then simply change the subject so that no further questions will be asked.

It is always embarrassing for a family to face a broken engagement, but it is better than to face years of an unhappy marriage. You should be thankful that your daughter recognized her mistake before it was too late and even more thankful that she had the courage to break the engagement.

Oregon City — (U.P.) — Horace Crowley, 21, Dayton, Ore., was found guilty of assault and battery last night by a jury, and was sentenced to a year in the Yamhill county jail.

Crowley, who was accused of beating four-year-old Richard Lightle, originally was charged with assault with intent to kill. He was found innocent of the more serious charge by the jury.
