Old Crusader Style Home Houses Swedish Institute

Jerusalem — (U.P.) — In one of the oldest of Jerusalem's 25 streets stands a vaulted stone house, in Crusader style, behind massive walls. Its tiny green doozer in the rampart gives onto an Arabian Nights courtyard gay with marguerites. But lovers of Eastern architecture would be surprised by the modern furniture from Stockholm.

Outside the venerable yellow stones, a diplomatic car is often seen. The Swedish charge d'affaires comes frequently to visit Scandinavian students at the Swedish Institute. He feels at home among the bright curtains and tasteful wooden lamps which the matron, Miss G. Andren, brought from Sweden.

Don't Study Theology
"Swedish Theological Institute is a misnomer," explained the director, Rev. H. Koshalala, a Lutheran minister and scholar of Rabbinic. "We don't study theology, but the language and land of the two Testaments. Although the institute was founded here three years ago by a Swedish committee, it is open to students of any race and creed. We begin the day's work with inter-denominational prayers. A general Protestant character has been given to the institute by the founders."

The committee includes Bishop T. Yslander, the Dean of Stockholm, Dr. O. Nysted and professors from the two chief universities, Uppsala and Lund. Justice N. Ljunggren represents the laity on the committee.

The expense of the nine-month course and the qualifications demanded of candidates will always limit the student roll to a select few. As each man has his own study-bedroom, the maximum accommodated is 10. The Scandinavian churches and

As We Live

Uncontrolled Curiosity Is Waste Of An Asset
Curiosity is natural. It leads to exploration, which may take the form of getting into any and everything, as it does in a child, or of asking questions, of reading, or of putting two and two together to arrive at one's own conclusions.

Curiosity acts as a driving force to the acquisition of knowledge. Without it a person will stand still and will be a failure in life.

However, if curiosity is to be an asset it must be directed and controlled. It cannot be permitted to run wild.

Uncontrolled curiosity is known as "nebbing." A "nebb" is a person who allows his curiosity to drive him to explore things which are of no real benefit to him but which satisfy a whim of the moment.

Most "nebbers" pry into other people's affairs. They are curious about why the Jones family did this or that, how the Greens can afford the new car they bought, or why Mrs. Brown is so secretive about her childhood days.

And, like the curious child, the "nebb" pries where he has no right to. In a friend's house he will pick up and examine things without first asking permission. If no one is around he may even open drawers and boxes, or read letters belonging to others.

People resent intrusion into their affairs. They object to being asked questions about matters which they feel are their personal affairs. They object to being asked questions about matters which they feel are their personal affairs. They resent it deeply if they know or suspect that others have pried into their things behind their backs. This "snooping" is a source of pleasure to a "nebb," but it is a misuse of a valuable emotional drive. It should be discouraged as soon as a child shows any inclination in that direction.

LETTERS FROM READERS

Uncertainty: "When one is uncertain about something, what is the best thing to do: try out what one thinks is right or wait until one is sure?"

(A) The old saying, "When in doubt, wait and see," is a good policy to follow if conditions permit. It isn't always possible, however, to be driving in the country and not know what direction to take, it would be best to wait until you could get directions. If, however, no one lives within miles of where you are and no one comes along, the only alternative is to try out one road and, if it is not the right one, turn back and try the other. This shows, as you can see, how inefficient it is to jump into things until you are sure.

Pleasures: "I feel that a reasonable amount of recreation is necessary, but my husband regards money spent for recreation as a foolish extravagance. He objects to going to movies, traveling, or doing anything that costs money. Who is right?"

(A) Most planned family budgets include some portion of the income for recreation and pleasures. Experts agree that this is a necessary part of life. If you have no recreation, you are likely to get "stale" and do work under ability. As few recreations today can be had without spending some money, recreational expenses are considered a "must."

Letter-Writing: "My mother never liked to write letters, but she did get around to it when any member of the family was away from home. Now she is in her sixties and rarely writes. Is this characteristic of old people?"
(A) Most old people show the same characteristics they showed when they were younger but in an exaggerated form. As your mother did not like to write letters when she was younger, that dislike has grown with the passing years to the point where she refuses to write at all.
