Men Splurge on Clothes Too; Socks Listed at $8.00 a Pair

By Elizabeth Toomey United Press Correspondent New York—Men can go on shopping sprees too, and some of the items they can purchase for their personal wardrobes would put any mink-minded woman shopper to shame.

There is a $36 men's handkerchief, for instance. It is neither gold plated nor inscribed with a treasure map - just a plain, white cotton handkerchief to be folded neatly in the breast pocket.

And how about a pair of men's ribbed lisle socks for $8.50? Not many women, even the most budget-free bride, would spend more than $2.00 for a pair of stockings.

Just to check on how the other half spends, we stopped by a shop that prides itself on being the most expensive men's tailoring establishment here, or anywhere.

Quality is a word that has little meaning today, Peter Knize, 29, the owner of the exclusive tailoring company, said as he escorted his visitor around his two-story shop.

"But when we say quality, we mean quality." That's when he got to the handkerchief counter. "We do not buy these by the dozen but by the piece," he said, displaying one of the $36 handkerchiefs.

"They are made in France from hand spun cotton." The $8.50 lisle socks are hand-made abroad too. Then there are other wardrobe items which customers as varied as the Shah of Iran and Marlon Brando order made up by Knize's own craftsmen.

Knize, who pronounces his name Kuh-nee-zha, smiled at the surprise Brando's name caused on the customer list. "He dresses very well now," he said. "He got tired of his T-shirt and blue jeans reputation."

Brando and the Iranian ruler and any other customers who can afford it choose suits that cost from $290 up. That's just for the trousers and jacket. If a fellow wants a vest, that's $20 extra.

Knize features undershorts made of fabric to match the shirt. The shah, he said, ordered 24 shirts and matching shorts on his recent visit to the U.S., and also 30 pairs of pajamas, and 32 other "garments," including suits, ski suits, tennis clothes and jackets.

At those prices, Knize and his tailors reserve the right to refuse if a man comes in and asks for a suit with heavily-padded shoulders and a generally zoot-cut. The family has been making clothes for royalty and well-to-do businessmen for nearly a century, all the way from Vienna, where Knize's grandfather began the business, to the present store.

"We cannot afford to make a bad suit," the present heir to the family tradition said. Oh, yes, and men pay $10.75 to have a suit pressed at this fabulous men's fashion headquarters. It's a real quality pressing.

Japanese Home Economist is Speaker For Luncheon of University Women Here

Mrs. Masu Takeda, Japanese graduate student in the school of home economics at Oregon State college, was guest speaker for the annual fellowship luncheon of Medford branch, American Association of University Women, Saturday afternoon at the Medford hotel.

Mrs. Takeda holds the Oregon Business and Professional Women's state scholarship for the current year and last year was the recipient of the American Home Economics association scholarship.

Mrs. Takeda is an instructor on the faculty of Japan Women's university. In addition to being a home economist, she is also a licensed second class architect in Japan and is a graduate of the College of Technology, Waseda university, in Tokyo.

Mrs. Takeda spoke on the climate, terrain, food, housing conditions, clothing, schools, agriculture, industry and economic conditions in Japan. Japan is in the process of Westernization and particularly is this evident in the younger generation of Japanese.

"Much of the housework of the average Japanese housewife would be considered less than drudgery to the American counterpart because household electrical appliances considered essential by the American housewife are practically non-existent in Japan," Mrs. Takeda stated.

"There is neither the electricity available to provide power to operate them, nor the money necessary to buy the products," she added.

Staples in the Japanese diet are fish, rice and soy beans, which are served three times a day. Mrs. Takeda said she was thoroughly enjoying the variety of American food, and particularly the American hospitality shown her everywhere she went.

To conclude her speech, Mrs. Takeda demonstrated typical Japanese dress, donning an especially elaborate kimono and accompanying sashes which in
