Unique Airplane Experiment Depends on Ice and Barrell

Madison, Wis. — (U.P.) — A professor tied one end of a rope to a barrel and the other end to the wing of his light plane and took off in a circle four times Saturday. The rope broke three times, but the craft had sufficient flying speed and altitude to prevent a crash.

Madison, Wis. — (U.P.) — Prof. John G. Winans' test of his theory that an airplane can be got off the ground by taxiing in a circle depended Saturday on whether the ice on Lake Kegonsa is strong enough to hold steady a partially submerged barrel.

The barrel and a 400-foot nylon rope are all that Winans figures he needs to prove that long runways are not needed to launch airplanes.

Frozen in Lake
The 53-year-old physics professor at the University of Wisconsin has frozen a barrel in the middle of nearby Lake Kegonsa. If the ice is strong enough to hold the barrel—and there is enough ceiling—he plans to tie one end of his rope to the barrel, the other to the wing of his light plane.

Then he will taxi in a circle, using the barrel as a pivot, until he has enough flying speed to take off.

The weather forecast called for drizzle or light snow, but Winans was confident that if the weather was suitable his test would be a success.

"If I can get a high enough ceiling to fly down there I can do it all right," he said. "There is no danger," he said. "I have worked out the formula on paper, and I know it will work."

Bad weather forced Winans to abandon the test two weeks ago. Last week Madison City officials decided to bar the test because of the danger to spectators.

Winans at that time planned to take off from the frozen surface of Lake Mendota which is inside the city. Lake Kegonsa is outside the city, and Winans is all set for the third try.

Sen. Jackson Backs 'Crash' Program of Atomic Progress

New York — (U.P.) — Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) called Saturday night for a "crash" program to develop peaceful use of atomic power. He said the United States is able to outdistance Russia in this field.

He discussed atoms-for-peace in a speech prepared for delivery at a dinner honoring Rep. Abraham J. Multer (D-N.Y.). "While there is little doubt that our military atomic race with the Russians is a neck-and-neck affair," Jackson said, "I firmly believe we have the present capability of instituting an overwhelming lead in the development and exploitation of the peaceful atom."

Essentially Engineering
"The task from here on out is essentially an engineering and industrial undertaking... with our tremendously superior industrial system, I am convinced we can soon overcome the problems that block the road to commercial feasibility."

"If we give this effort the all-out crash priority we gave the hydrogen bomb, we will give the lie to the charge that we have given lip-service to the peaceful atom. Not only would such a program prove our peaceful intentions, it would provide a great economic shot-in-the-arm for the peoples of the world."
