

Central Point Group Visits Mail Tribune

Twenty members of the staff of the Central Point Junior high school newspaper, The Pointers, visited the newsroom and shop of The Mail Tribune yesterday. They were accompanied by their advisor, Miss Ailene Inlow.

The group was led by Arvella Prom and Mickey Clark, co-editors of the school paper. Others in the group were Patty Kime, Beverly Little, Douglas Davis, Margaret Pendleton, Jeanette Pinney, Julia Thomas, Marilyn Watson, Gennie Wright, Loren Glenn, James Hays, Chris L. Pollock, Glenn Heath, Nancy Dillon, Verona Groshong, Jackie Pepper, Carolyn Stevenson, Charles Sinyard, and Karen Walton.

'Smelly Deal' Victim Returns Favor — Alive

Detroit — (U.P.) — William J. Abel, 24, who complained of getting a "smelly deal" on a drunk driving conviction earlier, released a live skunk Wednesday in the suburban Roseville police station.

"I understand that if you get bit by an animal you have to bring it in," he explained with a grin.

Commercial Teachers Guest of NOMA Group

Commercial teachers of four Rogue valley high schools were guests at a meeting of the National Office Managers association held this week at the Medford hotel. Theme of the meeting was commercial education and business.

The guests included Mrs. Irma Parr and Miss Inez Freeman, Talent high school; Roy Lundborg, Medford high school; Miss Martha Boshears, Crater high school, and Walter Nelson, Grants Pass high school.

Featured speaker at the meeting was John Pletsch, president of the Jackson County Chamber of Commerce, who discussed the economic future of the Rogue valley. A question and answer period followed his talk.

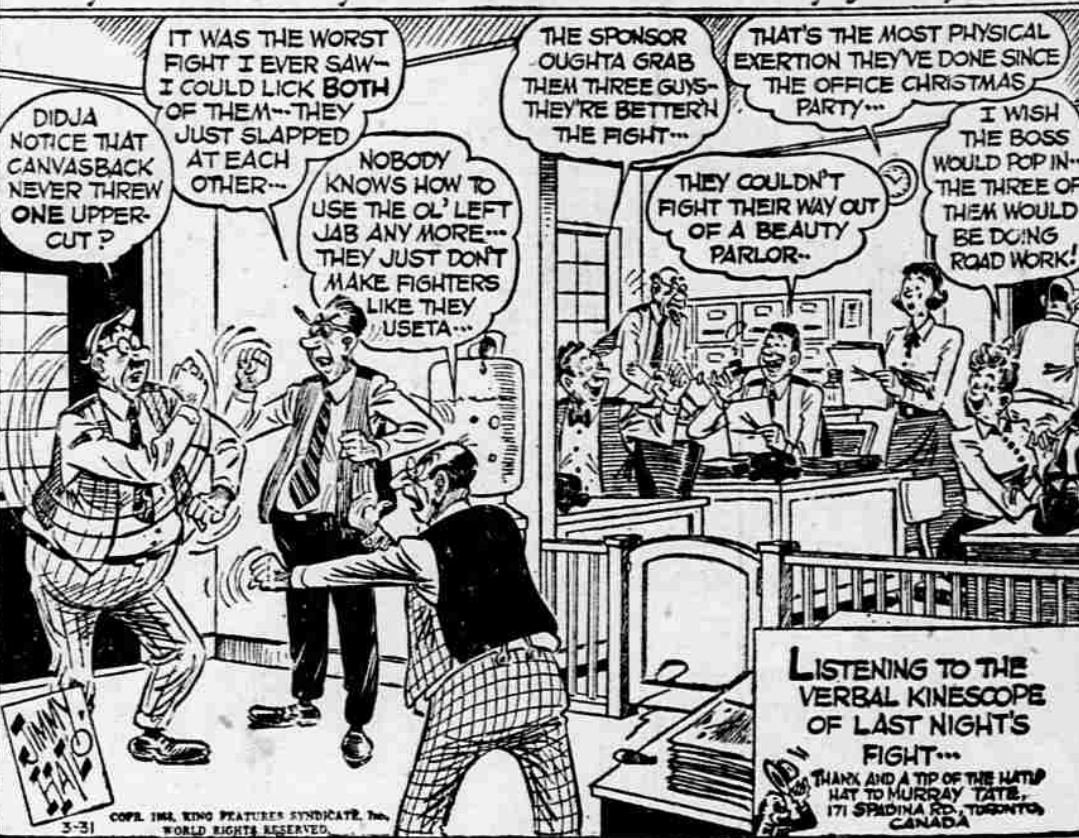

A report was submitted by the NOMA nominating committee. Election of officers is scheduled at the group's next meeting.

There still are about 45,000 one-room school houses in the United States, but because of consolidation trends, they are disappearing now at a rate of about 10 every day.

A Nichol's Worth of ... Comment On This and That

By HARMAN W. NICHOLS
United Press Feature Writer

Washington — (U.P.) — Robert B. Anderson, deputy secretary of defense, is going to get a replica of a weapon that helped us out in two wars.

This beautiful hand-made firing piece will come in mighty handy if Bob Anderson happens upon a charging buffalo along Pennsylvania Avenue.

The National Rifle Association of America is presenting to Anderson an exact copy of the flint-lock. This was used by our forebears in both the Revolutionary War and the War of 1812.

The rifle people are holding their 84th annual meeting in the capital. Some months back, Maj. Gen. Merritt A. Edson, USMC, retired, decided that a suitable memento for the guest speaker at the big banquet would be a flint-lock rifle. Since Edson is the executive director of the National Rifle Association, everybody agreed.

Expert Craftsman So the general dropped a line to Cecil G. Brooks of Lowell, O., an expert craftsman when it comes to building rifles. He told Brooks to get busy. Brooks studied up on what went into a flint-lock rifle and got busy.

The finished product, which cost a pretty penny and is something to catch the eye of any lover of firearms, is now shined up and ready — with a silver "presented to" imbedded in the Ohio curly maple wood stock.

Brooks worked hard to recapture the past. The rifle he has recreated precisely in the best tradition of early America, measures 62 3/8 inches overall and has a 46 2/3 inch octagonal barrel rifled with eight grooves. Its bore measures 0.37 inch.

Nothing is more traditionally American than the flint or the Pennsylvania or "Kentucky" rifle used by the men who fought their way west, tamed same, cleared the land of buffalo and staked claims in the good earth.

It was developed by German rifle makers who came here in the 18th century. The flintlock, indeed, was the finest firing piece of its day. Its inception introduced a new standard of deadly accuracy.

Actually, flintlock action was the prevailing ignition system for firearms from 1630 to 1830. A chisel-edge, rectangular wafer of flint was clamped between the jaws of a cock.

You pulled the trigger and released the cock under spring tension. The chisel edge of the flint scraped against the face of a steel battery making a shower of sparks which fell into the priming powder burned fast through the barrel vent to touch off the powder charge and send the bullet through the barrel.

The rifle people have quite an exhibition of weapons old and new at their meeting here. There is everything from the most primitive to the 50-buffalo guns to the very modern.

McKay Defends Policy On Partnership Power

Washington — (U.P.) — Interior Secretary Douglas McKay Wednesday defended the Eisenhower administration's "partnership" policy for development of power projects as "a positive program... that will make a valuable contribution to the power supply of the country."

In a requested appearance before the House Interior committee McKay also said: 1. The administration has no preference between private utility companies and governmental agencies in selecting "partners" for development of projects.

2. The government will continue to use power rates of federal projects as an informal "yardstick" to indicate what private rates might be.

Democratic committee members questioning him in turn attacked the partnership policy. Republican members told McKay they agreed with it.

Connecticut has 2,000,000 inhabitants and about 2,000,000 acres of forest land in its area of 3,202,100 total acres.
