

Buried Treasure

by Pinkney Gage

Unusual Glass Ash Tray Made in Form of Top Hat

I was on the point of asking about the glass top hat on the table beside Charles when he reached forward and ground out a cigarette in it.

"That's quite an unusual ash tray," I remarked.

"It isn't an ash tray any more," announced his wife, Charlotte, sweeping forward from the doorway to pick it up.

"And why not," asked Charles making an unsuccessful grab for the piece. "Are you an Indian giver?"

"It's still your birthday gift, if you insist," Charlotte said. "But you mustn't use it as an ash tray. It's too valuable."

She emptied the ashes into the fireplace, wiped out the inside of the glass hat, which measured a good six inches across the brim and set it down on the table. The early afternoon sunshine made it gleam as if it had been touched with magic. For a moment I had the illusion that it has been out of solid emerald.

"I showed this to Marie this morning," Charlotte said. "She's been collecting American glass for years, and right away, she identified it as a piece from the Congressville factory at Saratoga Springs, N.Y., probably from the 1885-95 period."

I asked how she knew since the piece wasn't signed.

"Because of the bright, deep, emerald green color and the fact that it looks like pieces she had seen that have been handed down in the families of men who worked in the factory," replied Charlotte.

"Furthermore," she added as an afterthought, but a clincher at that, "Marie wouldn't have offered me $25 for it, which she did, unless she could sell it for at least twice as much."

COLLECTOR LIKES CHANGE IN SINGLES: MAY FIND RARE BILL

"You'll have to take it in ones," the cashier said to the man ahead of me, "unless you'll wait a couple of minutes."

"That's all right. Give me the ones," The man who had given the girl a $20 bill held out his hand. "Matter of fact, that's what I would prefer to get."

"In fact, I'll be glad to take all the little bills you've got, or anyone else has," he continued, stepping over to the cigar counter and spreading his fistful of small, green paper into a fan.

Curious as to the cause of such conduct, I strolled over. The man with money was now busy dividing it into two piles. I asked if he were a collector, and if so, whether he ever found anything worth while that way.

"The answer is yes both times," he said. And with a quick motion he whipped out a pocketbook, opened it and extracted a one dollar bill which he handed to me.

"Got that today," he said. "It's a silver certificate with a blue seal, just to the right of Washington's picture, and the series mark 'Series 1928-D' is below."

I looked at it briefly, noting also the signatures of former U. S. Treasurer Julian and Secretary of the Treasury Morganthau.

"Too bad it isn't a crisp note," he continued. "It would be worth around $60 in that case. As it is, though—in pretty fair condition—I'll have no trouble in getting $30 for it."

BUYER'S THEORY ON FIRST EDITIONS PROVED SOUND

"There goes a man I hate to do business with," said George, nodding toward a fellow disappearing through the door.

Inasmuch as the cash register showed $34 for the small package of books the customer was carrying under his arm, I naturally inquired as to the cause of George's attitude.

"It isn't the money he spends," said George somewhat heatedly. "It's the way he spends it I object to."

"Today's a case in point. I had three Longfellow first editions. 'The Courtship of Miles Standish,' Boston, 1858; 'The Golden Legend,' Boston, 1851, and 'The Song of Hiawatha,' Boston 1855. 'They were priced reasonably enough, considering their good condition, at $12.50, and $15 and $16 respectively.

"When I protested, he said it was take it or leave it, and reminded me that very few people buy Longfellow any more and that my prices on the three were somewhat higher than the average of the auction figures."

"But why did you sell? After all, you didn't have to, and I can remember the day when you would probably have told him to scram," I said.

"No," George replied. "I could have kept the books for another couple of years. But I didn't want to."

"Why is he buying Longfellow," I asked.

George looked somewhat pained. "I don't like to admit it," he said, "but he has the very sensible idea that dislike of Longfellow is a fad, that his books will inevitably rise in value and that consequently the time to buy is now."

"And since his theory proved true a couple of years ago on Anthony Trollope and a couple of others, it undoubtedly will on Longfellow, too."
