

March Stream Flows in Region Moderately To Seriously Low

Portland — (U.P.) — Stream flows during March were moderately to seriously low over all the Pacific Northwest, according to the Department of Interior Geological Survey office here.

Record low stream flows for the month were recorded at 13 gauging stations on Northwest streams. Levels of ground water were below average in eight key wells out of the 19 surveyed.

The survey showed that some 3,000,000 acre-feet of water was released from storage in seven major power reservoirs in the Columbia system. This compared unfavorably with the 1,105,000 acre-feet released last year. Storage was down about 1,400,000 from last year.

The geological office said Oregon rivers at which record low flows were recorded were: The Grand Ronde at La Grande; the south fork of the Walla Walla near Milton; the Umatilla near Umatilla, and the John Day at Service Creek.

Washington rivers included the Skagit near Concrete and the Snake near Clarkston. In British Columbia, the Sproat River near Alborni was at an all-time March low.

Streams at Record Low
Record low Idaho stream flows were recorded on the Coeur d'Alene at Enaville; the Peyette near Horseshoe Bend; the Salmon at Whitebird and the Clearwater at Spalding, Kamish and Ahsahka.

Precipitation during the month was about 50 per cent of average in western Montana and the Cascades of Oregon and Washington; about average in southern British Columbia and central Idaho, and 40 to 75 per cent of normal in southern Idaho and central Oregon and Washington.

Argentine Catholics Continuing Protest

Buenos Aires, Argentina — (U.P.) — Groups of young Roman Catholics braved possible arrest Friday night by staging impromptu anti-government demonstrations in the streets of Buenos Aires.

There were no reports of violence or of arrests. Similar demonstrations Thursday night resulted in the arrest of "several" persons but Church sources said all were released in a matter of hours.

Chanted Slogans
Thousands of Catholics thronged churches in Buenos Aires for Good Friday services. The observances were quiet throughout the day but at nightfall small groups of young Catholics began to circulate from church to church. They chanted the same pro-church slogans that touched off police action during Thursday's demonstrations.

The original demonstrators were joined by other Catholics and soon several groups numbering up to 500 each were on the march.

The marchers maintained order in their ranks and disbanded quietly after demonstrating their support for the church in the running feud with the government of President Juan D. Peron.

Defied Police
Participants in the Holy Thursday religious procession had defied police orders to march into the vast Plaza de Mayo in the heart of Buenos Aires. There they held a mass meeting that blocked traffic for nearly an hour.

Police had granted permission for the parade but ordered it ended at the Church of Our Lady of Monserrat. In previous years, the procession had disbanded before the metropolitan cathedral in the Plaza de Mayo.

Authoritative diplomatic sources said the Argentine ambassador to the Vatican would discuss with top officials here the prospects of negotiating a concordate between Argentina and the Holy See along lines of that recently concluded between Spain and the Vatican.

Peron has summoned Ambassador Carlos Oliva Velez back to Buenos Aires for consultations on the church-state controversy.
