SCIENCE AT WORK

By DELOS SMITH
United Press Science Editor

New York — (U.P.) — Doctors never had such magical means of getting people well from infections as the antibiotics, so you can understand why they're gravely concerned because, with some infections, the antibiotics don't appear now to be nearly so magical as they were.

That is that is so largely the doctors' fault—they've used the magical means too lavishly, especially when something else would have done. They've demanded the magic from the doctors, and they've dosed themselves with antibiotics when and if they could, with no knowledge of the possibilities of harm.

The antibiotics are produced by mold organisms. Penicillin is the best known. They are—or were—sure death for hosts of bacteria which infect human beings, sicken them, and kill them. The trouble—which is the increasing concern of medical scientists and practicing physicians—is that some bacteria are learning how to resist antibiotics and keep right on multiplying and infecting.

Patient Neglected

The gravity of the problem was underscored by a recent issue of the American Medical Association Journal, which is circulated only to M.D.'s and the related professionals. It contained two reports on the present state of affairs in the microscopic world of bacteria and their antagonists, the antibiotics.

One dealt with the meaning of bacteria resistant to antibiotics to the physician trying to cope with them in the human body. It was prepared by Drs. Harry F. Dowling, Mark H. Lepper, and George G. Jackson of Chicago, and its recommendation was that doctors start paying more attention to the patient and less to the bacteria making him ill.

"In the field of infectious diseases the patient has come to be neglected as we have concentrated on the parasite," they said. "The obvious defects of antibiotic therapy, among the most important of which is the phenomenon of bacterial resistance to antibiotics should make us focus again on the central figure, the patient, the place where we should have focused all along."

New Discoveries

One basic trouble is that strains of resistant bacteria are getting around. They estimated that hospital attendants may harbor 85 per cent micrococci in their upper respiratory tracts which are resistant to penicillin. A patient enters the hospital when his micrococci are 51 per cent resistant. When he is discharged, his micrococci now are 88 per cent resistant.

The goal is to prevent bacterial strains from becoming resistant, and to prevent resistant strains from becoming more numerous and more widespread. This can be done by restrained and judicious use of the antibiotics so as to prevent bacteria from learning how to deal successfully with them. As the doctors said, the way is "to pay increasing attention to the host, his protective mechanisms, and his environment."

As of now, there is no reason for anyone to feel we're about to lose the benefits of the magical antibiotics. The bacterial tribes, by and large, have not learned too much about how to live with them. And new anti-otics continue to be discovered. However, there can be no ignoring the problem of bacterial "resistance" to antibiotics. The doctors said this "will probably become a problem of increasing gravity. This problem can be combated only for a while by discovering new antibiotics; sooner or later there will be an end to this."

Their alternative was more attention to the patient, less to the bacteria.
