A Tribute To the American Cancer Society

When we stop to consider that cancer kills 184,000 Americans every year, it is high time that all of us give generously to the most deadly of all the diseases which plague our nation! The American Cancer Society working vigorously day and night to establish clinics where early examinations are given and cancers discovered, is doing a work almost inconceivable in proportions and in importance to our very existence. This most humanitarian Society, through funds contributed from millions of men, women and children, provides treatment in needy cases and constantly carries on a vast amount of research raised by funds in their annual drives. Never has a cause deserved our generous support so desperately. Never has a group of sincere men and women performed a more laudatory service. We are abundantly proud of every one of them!
