

Agricultural Agent Includes President Among Clients for Farming Information

Gettysburg, Pa.—(U.P.)—Frank S. Zettle never has been to the White House, but you would have to list him as an adviser to the President.

On such matters, for instance, as what kind of fertilizer is best for a certain crop.

Zettle is Adams county agricultural agent, and his clients include a local farmer named Eisenhower.

"Little problems come up from time to time, they call in for help and we give it," Zettle says.

Zettle doesn't get phone calls from the busy chief executive himself, but from either Ivan Feaster, caretaker of the Eisenhower farm, or Gen. Arthur Nevins, who is helping the President get into the farming business.

"It may be a question of what fertilizer you should use for a certain crop or what corn variety, just the ordinary things that any farmer would call for," says the 32-year-old graduate of Penn State University's agricultural college.

In Transition Stage
Zettle has visited the Eisenhower farm "about half a dozen times" and has answered numerous phone queries. He said the Eisenhower staff needs a lot about the same amount of advice as any other farmer.

"They've been more or less in the transition stage out there," he said. "Originally they had a dairy herd and now they're switching over to beef."

"We've advised them on such matters as remodeling buildings and fences to accommodate the herd, and building pastures and growing a hay crop."

One of Zettle's assignments involved testing soil samples in his basement laboratory.

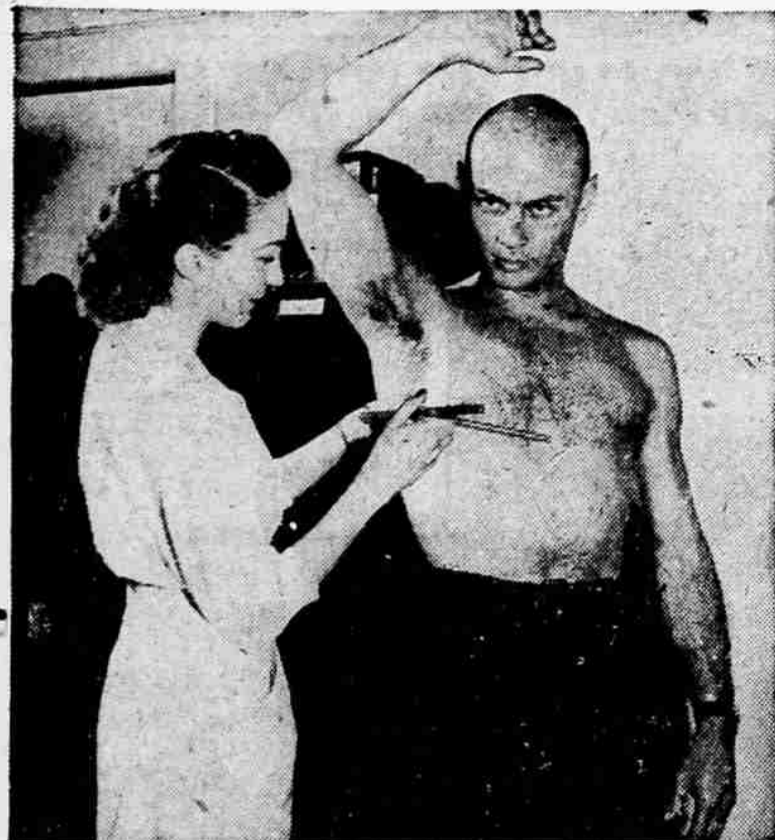

Good Beef Soil
"We checked a sample for lime requirement," he said. "This is important to the soil fertility program. They're concentrating on proper fertilizers, timing and moving over to more grassland in the rotation. That fits into their type of farming."

In Zettle's opinion, the 189-acre Eisenhower place four miles outside Gettysburg is "a good livestock farm."

"It's not on some of the best soil in the country, nor on the worst. It has the type of soil that fits in well in a livestock program," he said.

Zettle said other farmers in Adams county are proud to have the President among them. As for his own feelings:

"You don't have an opportunity every day of performing a personal service for the President of the United States."

GOOD EXAMPLE—Yul Brynner, star of "The King and I," gets measured for a chest x-ray. The American Cancer Society says this is best safeguard against lung cancer which shows up in early stages on an x-ray plate. Men over 45 should have such exams twice a year.

Surgical Society Hears Dr. Luce

The Medford Surgical society, including surgical specialists and other interested doctors in the city, heard Dr. James C. Luce, neurosurgeon, present a paper on peripheral nerve injuries, Monday night at the home of Dr. Jack Ingram.

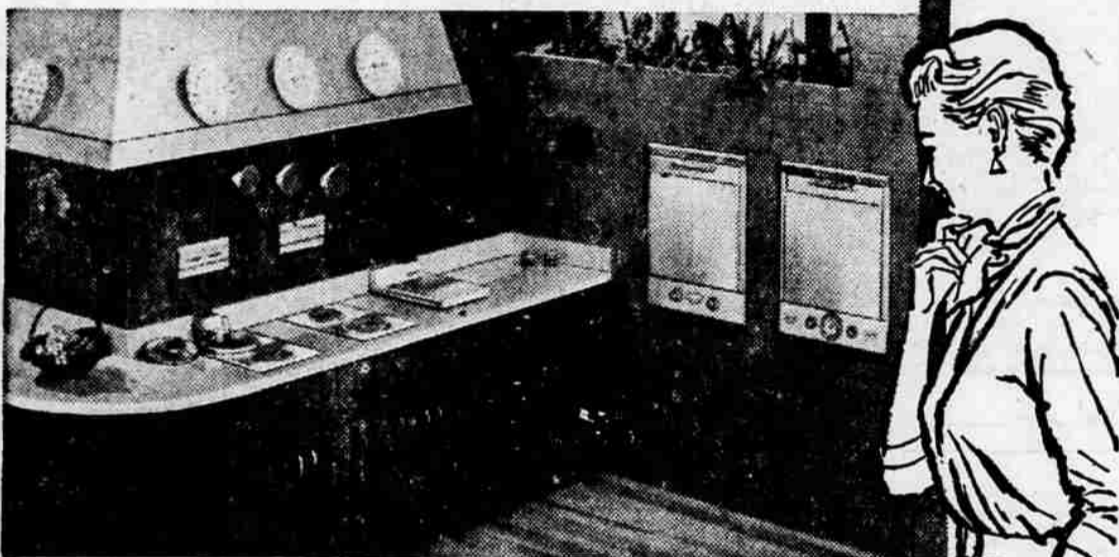

The talk was illustrated by lantern slides showing the latest methods of tests, diagnosis and treatment of nerve injuries of the upper and lower limbs. Techniques of surgical care drawn from Dr. Luce's wide experience in handling nerve casualties of World War II and Korea, provided background for the discussion.

The speaker also announced that electromyograms, which are of value in determining recovery of nerve injuries, can now be made on patients here. The machine is located at Sacred Heart hospital. Electromyograms are tracings indicating muscular activity through changes in electrical potentials in muscles.

The next meeting will be held in the fall.
