The course will be given from July 21 to August 5 by Professor Margery Bailey of the Stanford English department, who is director of the educational division of the Festival association. She is an authority on classic drama in production and an actress as well.

The Festival association produces four Shakespearean plays each year on an Elizabethan stage. An hour-long radio broadcast of "Macbeth," supervised by Andrew Love of NBC, will be scheduled for the national network in August.

The Stanford course will combine concentrated lectures and special addresses with observation of both rehearsals and performances and class demonstrations of fencing, make-up, costume, and music.

Besides Professor Bailey, lecturers will include Professor Angus L. Bowmer of Southern Oregon college, originator and director of the Festival.

Richard Graham, master of classic make-up, Frank Pinnock, expert on Tudor sports, and Bernard Windt, authority on Elizabethan music, will be among the specialists demonstrating stage arts.

A special book, "Ashland Studies in Shakespeare," is prepared annually for the students of the course. A collection of Shakespearean texts and rare Tudor books will be available for reference in a "Festival Collection" at the Ashland Public Library.

The course is open to college students and all persons over 16 years old with an informed interest in the subject.
