

Stiff New Safety Standards Adopted To Make Salk Polio Vaccine Better

Program Will Be Delayed Six Weeks By Federal Move

Washington — (U.P.)—The government today announced the formal adoption of stiff new safety standards for Salk polio shots "to make a good vaccine better" and to protect "our children."

Manufacturers said the move will delay full resumption of the nation's inoculation program by at least six weeks. But they unanimously agreed to the standards early today in the interests of safety.

Surgeon General Leonard A. Scheele proclaimed the safety of all vaccine "already produced and used," except for two suspect lots by Cutter Laboratories. But he said the manufacturers and scientists who met here all week agreed new safety standards are the "only possible course" to insure protection for America's children.

Scheele said the government's new vaccine clearance committee hopes to make recommendations in a few days regarding the clearance of vaccine made by Pitman-Moore and Wyeth Laboratories.

Inspection Report 'Excellent'
This vaccine, approved once, was ordered rechecked three weeks ago. Scheele indicated it will be cleared. He said the inspection report on the two firms was "excellent." Vaccine by Parke Davis and Eli Lilly was released previously.

Scheele said Cutter Laboratories, whose vaccine has been under suspension, is resuming production under the revised standards. Its vaccine will, of course, have to be cleared by the government batch-by-batch before being distributed.

The surgeon general's announcement came at the end of an all-week dispute over what form the safety standards should take. It also climaxed a marathon, 15-hour final session which didn't wind up until 2:30 a.m. today.

Five of the vaccine manufacturers agreed early Thursday to go along with the standards. But Pitman-Moore, which will have to do more retesting than the others, did not agree until late Thursday night after hours of discussion with top public health service officials.

'Minimum Slowdown'
Scheele said the revised standards, which will be made public later today and go into effect immediately, would cause a "minimum slowdown in the production of vaccine that is consistent with the added safety" involved.

Interviews with representatives of the six manufacturers showed that it will be six weeks or longer before substantial new vaccine supplies begin flowing into the inoculation program.

This means it will be impossible to give second shots to 9,000,000 first and second graders by June 25 as the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis had hoped. It also means an indefinite delay for the rest of the country's children since experts have urged extreme caution in administering any first shots during the coming upswing in the polio season. Dr. Jonas E. Salk, developer of the vaccine and a member of the clearance committee, said he has "no idea" when the government can begin releasing new batches of vaccine. But he indicated he is hopeful at least some shots can be cleared soon. Other sources said this might mean in the next two weeks.
