Welfare Report Made By Adventist Church

Portland, Ore. — Seventh-day Adventist church members in Oregon, Idaho, Washington, Montana, and Alaska last year completed a total of more than 424,440 man hours in an effort to make life easier for less fortunate people, according to a report released here this week by C. S. Joyce, director of the church's laymen activities in the North Pacific Union Conference.

Give Clothing
Working largely through the church's laymen's welfare organization in each church, the Dorcas Welfare society, and through personal efforts, members gave 319,935 articles of clothing to the needy, Mr. Joyce said.

More than 51,488 food baskets were given out, bringing the total number of persons helped to 155,875. Treatments given without charge in private homes or at Adventist Health and Welfare centers totaled 19,320.

Forty Centers

There are more than 40 such centers operating in the Northwest alone, the Adventist welfare director explained. Some are designated simply as Welfare center. When the term "Health" appears in the title, the center has arranged for the services of a qualified physician, dentist, or nurse to be available to the public at stated hours without charge.

The church's Home Missionary department estimates that the total cash value of welfare work done in the Northwest comes to $1,088,126. The world figure reaches $14,060,632. Of this amount $75,183.88 was actual cash contributed by church members.

Mr. Joyce pointed out that this report represents a continuing program of assistance to the needy without regard for race, creed, or nationality.
