

Proposed Design for U.S. Air Force Academy Draws Wrath of Democratic Solon

Washington—(U.P.)—Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.) wants the new Air Force Academy to look more like a "national shrine" and less like an overgrown cafeteria "on stilts."

"I said the proposed designs for the Air Academy, to be built at Colorado Springs, Colo., have caused "considerable consternation" in Congress and among notable church and architectural leaders.

Fogarty made the statement in comments published in the Congressional Record today. He said the design for the Academy Chapel looked like "an accordion lying on its side" or "a line of telescoped Indian tepees." Air Secretary Harold Talbot has said the present design is only tentative and will be reviewed.

Fogarty said the academy's plans should be basically revised from its present designs.

"First, the design is not American in conception and is unworthy of the tradition of this nation," he said. "Second, the taxpayers should not be saddled with an initial cost of $126,000,000 dollars to build a monument to experimental materials." "The Air Academy should be a national shrine, as are the historic buildings of West Point, and the Naval Academy in Annapolis," Fogarty said.

Norblad Protests Danish Butter Use

Washington—(U.P.)—Rep. Walter Norblad protested today that although the government has 200,000,000 pounds of surplus butter in storage, the Army is selling Danish butter at its post exchange in Okinawa.

The Oregon Republican suggested in a letter to Army Secretary Robert T. Stevens that the Army and Agriculture Department could "well get together" on a plan to have the Army sell some of the U. S. surplus.

Norblad said he learned recently that the post exchange at Okinawa is selling the Danish product to both military and civilian personnel on the island. He said a friend who returned from there "brought me for my file a wrapper from a pound of this Danish butter as evidence of the fact."

He said if the same situation exists at other post exchanges around the world "I would be certain suggest that it should be corrected."

Pigs, Poultry Eating More Sea Food Every Year

Washington — (U.P.) — Pigs and poultry are eating more sea food every year and thriving on it.

Government experts said it makes them grow faster and, in the case of chickens, makes them lay more eggs.

The fish meal business has become one of the fastest growing industries in commercial fishing as a result.

Most of it is due to a small her-ring-like fish called the menhaden which is found only along the Atlantic coast from Maine to the Gulf. It is considered a trash fish rather than a food fish, but when dried and ground into meal it makes an excellent food supplement for swine, chickens and turkeys.

C.E. Peterson of the U. S. Fish and Wildlife Service's statistics section said 52,950 tons of menhaden fish meal were produced in 1939. The amount has increased every year since, reaching 183,091 tons in 1954.

Unknown Food Factor
There usually is a shortage of fish meal every year, Peterson said, but it isn't because of the faithful little menhaden which appear in prolific numbers annually.

The fault lies with the temperamental herring and sardines on the west coast which sometimes don't show up in great numbers. For the last few years, only sardine waste has been converted to fish meal. Some whole herring were used.

Last year, Peterson said, the United States produced a total of 257,000 tons of all types of fish meal but had to import another 145,777 tons to meet demands.

Peterson and D. Y. Aska, chief of the fishery marketing service, said the fish meal is strictly a supplement. For chickens and turkeys it should be about five to seven per cent of the diet; for swine, three to five per cent.

Peterson said nobody knows what in the fish meal is so good for pigs and poultry. "It's an unidentified food factor," he said. "Anyway a broiler, when fed the supplement won't eat as much food, but will get as big in 10 weeks as it will in 13 weeks without fish meal."
