

Expert Says Russia Needs Time To Deal With Many Problems

(Editor's Note: There is a big field for speculation as to the reason for what undoubtedly is an important revamping of Russian foreign policy. The following assessment of Russia's position is given by an expert on Soviet thought and policies.)

By W. A. RYSER

London —(U.P.)— Russia needs time in order to deal with some pressing problems of its own. This fact emerges after an extensive survey of recent internal developments in the Soviet Union by experts here.

These experts believe that the current switch in Soviet foreign policy is due as much to difficulties at home as to the firmness of the West.

Formidable Problems
Soviet government leaders seem to be confronted by a series of formidable internal problems which they need time to settle.

These problems may be listed as:
1. The unresolved struggle for power. The main thing about the Russian Communist Party is that it has remained unpurged after the downfall of Premier Georgi M. Malenkov. This is attributed to the moderating influence of the army, which is now more powerful than ever before, and in the failure of any one man to win supremacy. The present period of government by committee is likely to continue until some candidate for Stalin's mantle emerges with the backing of both the Communist Party and the army.

2. The Agricultural Crisis: Russia's difficulties in producing enough food, publicly admitted by Communist Party First Secretary Nikita S. Khrushchev, have not been overcome. Grandiose schemes including vast land reclamation projects have failed to bring victory in the fight for more grain and more cattle.

3. The Industrial Lag: The recent conferences which industrial bosses have held in Moscow have shown that Russia is falling behind in new techniques and scientific invention. Productivity in industry remains low. Low productivity is becoming a major national problem because of the shortage of labor. As the result of the conferences, Lazar M. Kaganovich has been named labor and wages boss and Vyacheslav Malyshev has been named head of a committee on new industrial techniques.

4. The Coordination of Economic Plans and Help for Red

China: There are indications that the Kremlin plans to integrate its own and satellite economic systems in such a way as to give maximum aid to Red China in its industrialization campaign.

The most immediate of the four problems is the struggle for power within the Communist Party. This struggle may be resolved before the next meeting of the All-Soviet Union Communist Party, due some time next year.

The agricultural problem is a long range one. The latest time limit for the fulfillment of a target of 165,000,000 tons of grain is 1960.

The problem of reorganizing Soviet science also is a long-term one. As for the industrialization of Communist China, the needs of that country are limitless.
