Incidence of Polio Seen Higher In Areas of Better Standards

Washington—(U.P.)—One of the strangest things about polio is that it seems to strike hardest among people who have the highest living standards and best sanitary facilities. Whether it actually does has not been proved. Some polio authorities reject the idea. But U.S. Public Health Service officials said today that most students of polio believe the theory valid. Underprivileged children, they said, seem to develop greater immunity to the disease than do youngsters in better circumstances.

Dr. Albert B. Sabin, noted biologist of the University of Cincinnati, is a firm believer in the theory. So is Dr. Thomas Francis Jr., of the University of Michigan who wrote the report on Salk vaccine, and Dr. John R. Paul of Yale.

"In general," Sabin has written, "the poorer the population and the standard of living and sanitation, the more extensively is polio virus disseminated among children and the lower is the incidence of paralytic polio when virulent strains of virus appear."

Two other polio researchers reported in the American Journal of Hygiene that immunity to polio develops and increases "to a significantly higher degree in the lower economic groups."

The United States, with a high standard of living, has one of the highest reported polio rates in the world. The same is true of Canada, Britain, the Scandinavian countries and other so-called advanced nations. In less advanced areas, the reported incidence is much lower. In 1952, for example, there were 56.5 cases per 100,000 population in Denmark and 36.9 in the United States. But the reported statistical rate in Colombia was only four-tenths of one case per 100,000. And in the Mideast and Asia the number of reported cases was negligible. Authorities said many of these variations may not be real. In some countries, the system for reporting diseases is better than others.

Even so, experts like Sabin believe there are scientific reasons for believing the polio incidence really is highest among children in good circumstances. They argue that underprivileged children come in contact with polio earlier and more often and so develop better immunity.

Bishop Expelled By Peron Presides At Rio Congress

Rio De Janeiro — (U.P.) — Argentine Bishop Msgr. Manuel Tato, expelled by Argentine President Juan D. Peron, will preside at the second session of the 36th International Eucharistic congress, it was announced today.

Jaime de Barros Cardinal Camara of Rio De Janeiro said Bishop Tato will replace Antonio Cardinal Caggiano, of Rosario, Argentina, who was to have presided at tonight's session in Congress square.

Neither Cardinal Caggiano nor Santiago Cardinal Copello of Buenos Aires was able to attend the congress.

Tato arrived here from Rome Saturday with Benedetto A. Cardinal Masella, personal representative of Pope Pius XII. Heading a large Argentine delegation, Tato has been cheered on every public appearance he has made at the congress.

Tato was one of two Roman Catholic leaders expelled by Peron at the height of the church-state controversy in Argentina. Later Peron said they could return.

Teodoro Cardinal Gouveia, of Lourenco Marques, Mozambique, presided at Wednesday night's opening session attended by more than 100,000 pilgrims in vast Congress Square. Lourenco Marques, an Indian ocean port 300 miles east of Johannesburg in South Africa, is considered a likely choice for the site of the next congress.

Cardinal Camara read a message sent to the congress by President Eisenhower expressing the hope it will inspire all men of all creeds to "work with renewed devotion for a just peace on earth."

The President said "those who exercise spiritual leadership among free nations constitute a great force that can do a great deal to carry forward that cause."

Cardinal Camara sent a reply that the President's request for peace was being answered by the 20 cardinals, 300 bishops, thousands of priests and a million pilgrims from the world over attending the congress.

These experts say underprivileged children generally live in bigger families and thus are likely to experience more contacts early in life. These children also live in crowded areas where they are in constant contact with other children.

Poor sanitary conditions also might make underprivileged children more likely to be exposed early.

But among children of families enjoying better living conditions, early contacts with the disease are few. As a result, some authorities theorize, when the disease does strike such children, it hits harder because they have few if any defenses built up in the body to combat it.

Apparently supporting this theory is the fact that in Texas, the reported polio attack rate among Mexican immigrants seems to be somewhat lower than among Anglo-Americans. There also are more adult cases among the Anglo-Americans, indicating less early exposure.
