As We Live

By ELIZABETH HURLOCK, PH.D.
MEN LACKING MANNERS AREN'T MORE MASCULINE

To some people, manners are important; to others, they are not only unimportant, but may even be regarded as the mark of a "sissy." What should a person do when the manners of the people she associates with fall below her standards? This question is raised by the young woman who writes:

(Q) "As children, my parents insisted that we learn good manners. Ever since I can remember, I have said 'please' and 'thank you,' and I have risen to my feet when an older person comes in the room, held open the door for others, etc. Now I realize that manners are only superficial and that one can have sterling qualities beneath bad manners just as one can have bad qualities beneath good manners. However, it does disturb and embarrass me to go out with young men who not only have bad manners, but who make fun of anyone who shows common courtesies. I have never known or dated a young man whose manner did not embarrass me. Am I living according to old-fashioned standards, or do I know the wrong kind of young men?

(A) While it is true that people of today are more casual about the common courtesies of life than they were a generation or so ago, I think you will not find that reasonably good manners are considered "old-fashioned." Young men can learn good manners, just as girls can, but they must feel that manners are important and worth their while. The men you have known do not seem to feel that and as a result, they have not tried to learn good manners.

In general, it would seem that your problem is that you have known and dated the wrong men. Other girls may admire their disdain of good manners, but it is too contrary to your upbringing and standards for you to accept. It is up to you to find young men who have manners that will not embarrass you. You surely cannot have much fun on a date under such conditions, so why bother to go out with them? You can usually tell when you first meet a

Hearty Lima Casserole

A filling, satisfying casserole for a back-yard or pot-luck shindig? Here's a good one. Season hot cooked large dry lima beans with a little grated onion and mix with a generous amount of grated cheddar cheese. Place in shallow baking dish and add un-diluted evaporated milk to almost cover limas. New top with well-drained solid pack tomatoes or peeled and thick-sliced fresh tomatoes and sprinkle with some more cheese. Bake 30 to 40 minutes in a moderate oven. For "holding" heat, wrap generously with old newspapers.
