Local Man Has Close Call As Boat Upsets in Klamath

Lester Cass, Medford merchant and sportsman, has some new clothes which he doesn't need, but he's mighty pleased to be able to wear them. For Lester came mighty near to drowning in Klamath lake last week.

Mr. and Mrs. Cass joined Byron Wingham and "Buss" Sergeant of Klamath Falls Tuesday for what promised to be a fine day of boating. The men were using a glass boat powered with an outboard motor. Suddenly when one of the passengers shifted his position just as his companion gunned the motor, all three were dumped into the water and the boat did a flip-flop.

The fates were kind, for a Klamath Falls man happened to be running his cabin cruiser nearby, saw the accident and came to the rescue. He fished the men from the drink, hitched on to the overturned boat and started the trip to shore.

The disconsolate Lester took stock and found that he was minus most of his clothes—he had taken off his shirt and trousers because they had been dampened by a passing wave—his brand new glasses and his ring of keys. As soon as the rescued and rescuers reached the dock, where the excited Mrs. Cass was waiting, the shivering Medford man told her to hurry to town and buy him some clothes.

After she left, the men righted the boat and there, safe and sound in the air pocket under the craft, were the clothes—even the shoes and the bill fold in Lester's pocket, as well as most of the boat gear.

In the excitement the three men failed to find out who their rescuer was. Later they arranged to buy him a thank you gift but they didn't know who to give it to, and telephone calls to Klamath Falls Saturday night still didn't bring his identity to light.

Whoever he is, he earned the everlasting gratitude of the three men who for a long time will remember how cold was the water and how far the distance to shore.
