"Let Us Recommend a Reliable Painter"

has eluded historians. Now the warrior's route may have been found.

A noted British scholar, Sir Gavin de Berr, director of London's Natural History Museum, has remapped the great march by tracing clues of terrain, climate, even trees that Hannibal saw.

They lead over a 9,600-foot pass on the French-Italian border, Col de la Traversette. This is a higher and more hazardous way than any previously thought possible for Carthage's army to have crossed.

Marching Through Gaul — The 28-year-old general marched from Spain across southern Gaul with 50,000 foot soldiers, 9,000 horsemen, and 30-odd Moroccan elephants.

He crossed the Rhone near the present French town of Arles, Sir Gavin says—much farther south than historians previously thought. He tricked his elephants onto a raft by covering it with earth. Some panicked and fell off, but then they waded, for the river there was wide, slow, and shallow.

A Roman legion under Scripo, landing hastily at Massilia (now Marseille), arrived too late to prevent the crossing. Hannibal marched north, not to the Isere as long believed, but to the Agygues tributary.

He turned east, fighting off hostile Gauls. From the ancient historians Livy and Polybius, Sir Gavin deduces that Hannibal followed the Durance River into Alpine foothills above today's town of Gai.

Other Gauls guided him, only to attack later. The precise pass they led him to has remained a mystery. Livy and Polybius write that it was pine-covered, very high and dangerous, coated not only with new snow but hard-frozen snow from the winter before. The plains of Italia could be seen from its crest.

Only one pass could meet all these conditions in 218 B. C. Sir Gavin determined by long scientific study—the Col de la Traversette.

Snow, Fire and Vinegar — Even today this remains wild, rugged country, frequented by smugglers, crossed by neither highway nor railroad. Monte Viso, rising 12,602 feet high just south of the pass, was covered with pines in that ancient age, for Virgil describes them. In October, when "the setting of the Pleiades" was approaching, it would have had the right snow conditions.

Through "narrow, stony, and broken ways" Hannibal fought. Treacherous ambushes cost him many men and animals. Others fell from terrifying precipices. Rocks rolled down on them. Descending across avalanche snowfields, "the soldier knew not where to set his foot with safety."

To make passage for the elephants, ancient accounts tell, Hannibal's men "wrought into the hill itself" by first lighting a fire on one huge rock and then drenching it with vinegar. Long scoffed at, this was a recognized ancient method of mining and attacking fortification, Sir Gavin says.

When Hannibal's army at last marched out upon the plain of Piedmont, it numbered 20,000 foot and 6,000 horse. It had taken them five months from Spain, but they had crossed the mountain wall.

Vaccine for Colds Declared Developed

Washington—(U.P.)—The government will announce shortly they have developed a vaccine which is expected to prove effective against one of the viruses linked with the common cold and similar infections, informed sources said today.

The vaccine is not the answer to the common cold. But its development is considered a major step in man's long struggle to conquer many of the cold-like infections which cost the nation $1,000,000,000 a year in lost wages alone.

The Public Health Service said the results of the first field trials with the vaccine will be made public in a few weeks. It refused to give any details but medical sources said the vaccine proved effective.
