jected it. This is a neat way to blame grandfather, but it doesn't mean so much when we tally up the good qualities we inherited, if any. It is well to remember that when Dr. Osler and his contemporaries were the undisputed medical authorities, there was virtually no knowledge and certainly no science of nutrition, and the eminent, leading or foremost physicians and specialists pronounced their views, opinions or diagnoses with complete assurance that the accuracy of their judgment was not subject to proof or disproof by, say, precise chemical test or X-ray examination. This explains why 'gout' was so common in the 19th century and is so rare today.
