Supreme Court Rejects Suit by Clackamas County

Washington — (U.P.) — The Supreme court rejected today a suit by Clackamas county, Ore., which sought to have 472,000 acres of western Oregon timber land administered by the Interior department.

The court gave no reason for its action.

Clackamas claimed that Congress had no right in 1954 to pass a law transferring administration of the land from the Interior department to the Department of Agriculture.

The county argued that the land was "revised" from a grant to the Oregon and California railroad and belongs to Oregon, not the federal government. As such, it contended, the Interior department should hold the land in trust or receivership for the state. It also said that transfer of the land to the Department of Agriculture will reduce the county's income from the property.

Freighter's Anchor Damages Yacht

San Francisco — (U.P.) — The converted yacht Carmac suffered an estimated $60,000 damage yesterday when the Japanese freighter Kyohei Maru dropped its anchor on fog-shrouded San Francisco bay.

No one was injured. The freighter was undamaged, but the Carmac's mast was knocked down and the pilot house and deck were splintered.

River pilot G. H. Brokaw, who was aboard the converted yacht, said the vessel was barely underway off Angel Island en route up the Sacramento river when he heard the freighter's whistle and she loomed up out of the fog 300 feet away.

Brokaw said the Carmac began backing at full speed immediately but the Kyohei Maru bore down and hit the smaller vessel a glancing blow.

The freighter's anchor, hanging outside its hawser hole, broke loose and fell on the Carmac's deck along with 40 or 50 feet of heavy anchor chain.
