Back Stairs: Business at Ike's Office

By FRANK ELEAZER United Press Correspondent Gettysburg, Pa.—(U.P.)—Backstairs at the Gettysburg White House:

Presidential aides are doing everything possible to confine official business of President Eisenhower's downtown office. This is in line with desire of the President and Mrs. Eisenhower to preserve their farm home as just that—a home. They don't want it made into an office.

But despite the best efforts farm most days resembles a downtown parking lot.

A typical count the other day showed 13 cars and trucks parked around the President's house and barn. And this probably wasn't a complete tally, since it covered only those vehicles in view from a single vantage point.

The White House staff is not too happy about Tony, the black and white Shetland pony owned by the Eisenhower grandchildren and stabled on the President's farm for their use when they visit here.

It seems that the pony—true Scot that he is—has a slightly unpredictable streak. David, the President's 7-year-old grandson, has ridden Tony a number of times and reportedly has been tossed off almost as often.

Every youngster who ever had a pony has been thrown. But with these particular youngsters, nobody takes any chances. So when David rides Tony or drives him, hitched to a pony car, a Secret Service man always is right there to catch, grab, or take over.

Maybe the children's second pony—a gift last week from J. R. Lackey of Asheville, N.C.—will prove more even tempered. It is a brown and white "horse pony," five years old, and named, appropriately, "Little David."

The crisis atmosphere that pervaded the temporary White House in Denver after the President's heart attack Sept. 24 has vanished. Operations at Gettysburg now are about as routine as is possible on any presidential trip or visit outside Washington. With the President well on the way to recovery, newsmen rarely even ask anymore how he is feeling. When they do the answer is "fine."

The press corps, incidentally, has been dwindling somewhat. Still on the scene daily are about 21 newsmen, including three representing radio and TV. There are also still and movie photographers, and technicians of various kinds. Except for the fact they have about the world's biggest press room to work in, this still would stack up as a crowd.

Clare Boothe Luce Phone Line Tapped

New York —(U.P.)—The telephone of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce was tapped three weeks before she was named ambassador to Italy by President Eisenhower, a New York private detective testified yesterday.

John G. Steve Broady, detective and attorney on trial for illegal wire tapping, told a General Sessions Court that he had been engaged to check Mrs. Luce's telephone for a tap. Broady said his investigator, Carl Ruh, found such a tap on Jan. 19, 1953.

Broady, testifying in his own defense, earlier denied that he had placed taps on any of the 17 lines on which he is charged with illegal eavesdropping.

Broady is charged with illegally tapping the telephone lines of 17 prominent business and social leaders through listening posts which were capable of listening in on virtually every phone conversation on Manhattan's push ad polished steel east midtown area.
