

Psychologist Visions New School of Thought

By DELOS SMITH
United Press Science Editor
New York—UP—A psychologist is advocating a new school of psychological thought and action.

Emerson Coyle, psychology teacher and counsellor at Brooklyn College, invited his fellow scientists to say "to what extent, if any, has psychology undercut old-fashioned self reliance and personal accountability."

His idea was that psychologists have gone too far in "understanding" the socially unacceptable acts and failures of their patients.

Value Undetermined
"Understanding," he said, can go so far as to carry the implication that psychologists accept "deviant behavior." He added that there was "room for a psychology" based on "an insistence on toeing the mark." Otherwise, "the value of meeting standards" is undermined.

He had in mind the popular school of child psychology which seeks, at any cost, to spare the child from becoming "inhibited." People take it so seriously, "one dare not spank the child until a psychology book has been consulted."

In high schools and colleges, teachers send students to psychologists for some such reason as these: "Student x has cheated on my examination. I think he is disturbed." "Student is charged with statutory rape. I think he is disturbed."

"Might it not be that disciplinary action rather than 'supportive therapy' is the first order of business?" Coyle asked.

Discipline Unknown Concept
"I wonder to what extent poor or non-existent study habits, poor spelling, difficulties with mathematics and languages in high school and college may not be attributed to parental and/or personal laxity "don't push your child" rather than to unresolved oedipal complexes or to hatred of the father image or authority or society."

He used to think, he said, that a psychologist should never let a person taking his professional counsel, know he disapproved of that person's behavior, no matter how deviate.

But now, after much experience, he feels that with "a significant number" of the persons who seek his professional help, "the concept of a discipline in general and of self-discipline in particular is a foreign and unknown concept." In short, rather than insistence upon adherence to standards having failed or having caused maladjustment, adherence to standards has not been required or tried in all too many instances.

Directors Elected To Ashland Club

Ashland—Four directors were elected at a meeting of the Siskiyou Knife and Fork club here recently.

Those elected are Dr. Jack Ingram and Dr. Lee Melish of Medford, and John Cotton and Harry Skerry of Ashland.

Skerry, president of the club, announced that members have voted to continue starting meetings at 7:30 p.m. to accommodate members living in Medford. There was a proposal to start meetings at 7 p.m.
