Determination of Paternity

Dr. Hoppe, in a German journal, has just announced that by using the Rh factors in blood he has been able to determine paternity in 2,200 cases, with an accuracy of 99.7 per cent. In a court case, what blood tests do is not so much to say that a certain man is a child's father, but rather that a certain man could not possibly be the child's father.

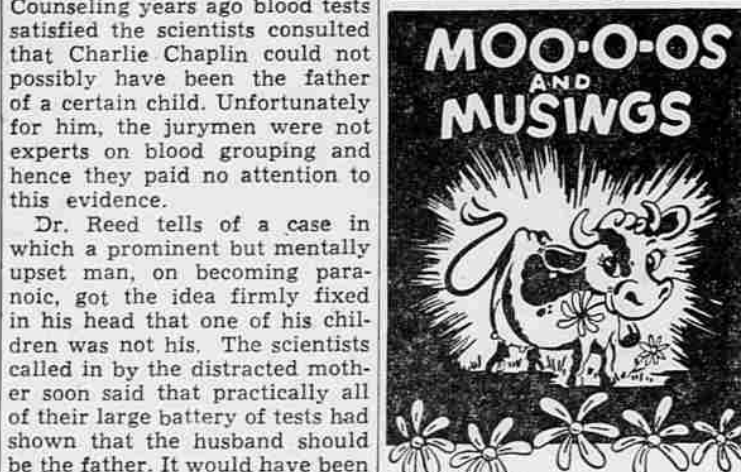

As Dr. Reed says in his new and fascinating book on Genetics Counseling years ago blood tests satisfied the scientists consulted that Charlie Chaplin could not possibly have been the father of a certain child. Unfortunately for him, the jury were not experts on blood grouping and hence they paid no attention to this evidence.

Dr. Reed tells of a case in which a prominent but mentally upset man, on becoming paranoid, got the idea firmly fixed in his head that one of his children was not his. The scientists called in by the distracted mother soon said that practically all of their large battery of tests had shown that the husband should be the father. It would have been very hard to find in that city another man who, with all the blood peculiarities noted, could have been the father of that child. Because of the man's lack of sanity the doctors did not expect this proof to influence him, but to the mother's great joy it satisfied him entirely, and he and his wife and child were immediately reconciled.

Other Features

Naturally, when it comes to establishing paternity, there are other features that can be used, such as the color of the hair and eyes, the appearance of the hair and its distribution on the scalp, long or short fingers, and so on. I remember one of my patients, a man who had a reddish patch of skin running up on his forehead over his right eye. He said to me one day in fun, "If I were a distrustful man, I could rest my mind in peace because every one of my four boys has the same patch in the same place on his forehead."

According to Drs. James Barrett Brown, Minot P. Fryer, and Thomas J. Zaydon, of St. Louis, Mo., the first skin bank in a civilian hospital now has been established. In the case of any big disaster such a skin bank could be valuable. The skin could be helpful to anyone who has received serious and widespread burns. Skin borrowed from a person who recently has died will not "take" permanently; it will stay in place only from 10 to 30 days, but during this time raw areas on the body will be covered, and this can be very helpful to the patient. The grafts may save his life.

Dr. Alvarez regrets he hasn't time in which to read or answer requests for information.
