

Writer Tells Experience With Snow Blindness on Expedition To Antarctic

Editor's note: One of the most terrifying experiences encountered by Polar explorers is snow blindness, caused by the glare of the sun reflected on endless expanses of snow. The victim goes blind temporarily and suffers extreme pain. If he is alone it can mean death. Davis Merwin, United Press correspondent with operation "Deep Freeze" in the Antarctic, tells in the following dispatch what it's like. He went through it.

By DAVIS MERWIN
United Press Correspondent
Abord Icebreaker Glacier, McMurdo Sound, Antarctica (U.P.) — Snow blindness is like a sunburn. You don't know you're getting it until it's too late. I had spent two days at the burgeoning metropolis of Hut Point on McMurdo Sound where the American expedition "Deep Freeze" is setting up one of its principal Antarctic bases. There were acres of volcanic ash, makeshift radio communications, tents, lumber, prefab panels, half-assembled buildings, fuel drums, storage tanks, pipe lines and a seemingly endless confusion of human activity.

Signs Indicate Old West Dying Out; Sight of Horse Makes Buffalo Nervous

By H. D. QUIGG

New York — (U.P.) — The Old West is dying. It's so far gone that even the sight of a horse makes the buffalo nervous. They're used to being herded with jeeps.

That's the word of Les Price, proprietor of the country's largest buffalo herd. He's superintendent of the 72,000-acre Custer State Park in South Dakota.

"The buffalo herdsman have jeeps now, and the herd is used to them," Price said in an interview. "The buffalo will attack a horse and kill it, now. If you ride out in there among 'em with a horse, you're in trouble."

The Custer park herd numbers about 1500 head after the "winter kill." The herd has to be reduced twice a year by expert marksmen to keep it from getting bigger than the range's grasslands feeding capacity.

Conservation measures have brought the North American buffalo population back to around 100,000. Price said, from its low of fewer than 6000 around the turn of the century when hunters slaughtered them for the skins, at $2 a skin. Before the white hunter came, 60 to 100,000 buffalo roamed over an area now covered by 34 states.

A full grown buffalo bull weighs 2400 to 3000 pounds, stands 6½ feet tall, is faster than a horse. Almost unanimously, they refuse to be buffaloes, by anything. Price recalls one instance of a buffalo in the road in the way of a bus loaded with tourists.

"The driver decided to try to nudge him off the road," Price said. "Well, a bull loses his temper just like that. This one nudged right back. He busted up the front end of the bus, and they had to get another bus to take the tourists out."

"We've got a dozen jeeps that we use in herding. A jeep weighs about half what a mature bull does. I've seen a buffalo cave in the back end of a jeep with one kick."
