The Medical Roundup

HEMORRHOIDS, OR PILES

Many ask what to do about hemorrhoids. In many cases, all that one needs do is to keep the fecal material from becoming hard and bulky. The passage of large hard masses can tear the hemorrhoids and thus produce bleeding. Sometimes it causes the blood to clot in a bruised hemorrhoid, and then the person suffers great pain for ten days or so. The person will then feel distress on sitting down.

Obviously, a good way to keep from getting trouble with hemorrhoids is to keep the bowel movement fairly soft, as with the help of some canned fruit or mineral oil or a small dose of compound licorice powder. When a mass of hard feces is present it should not be forced out until some warm water or mineral oil has been put into the bowel.

Scores of persons who have had hemorrhoids removed by someone who was not very expert have assured me that never again would they ever let anyone operate on their piles unless he was an able and experienced specialist in this field. An inexperienced surgeon can perform an operation that will leave the person's anus most uncomfortable for the rest of his days. It may be too tight or too loose or too sore or always wet.

much larger. They just are not pleasant to look at. I imagine that a man, using an electric needle, by coagulating a spot on one end of the little veins, could cause them to disappear, but it would take time and skill. Usually it seems best to leave the veins alone, and perhaps to keep out of a bathing suit.

The large varicose veins which can cause pain and trouble look like good-sized worms lying under the skin. Some are as big as the little finger. In many cases such veins do not cause much trouble and can be disregarded. They may cause much trouble when they have become inflamed, as after a confinement or an operation. Such varicose veins can look ugly. Sometimes the leg swells, or it swells only after walking, or toward the close of day, then the patient can get help from an elastic bandage, or from one of the new elastic stockings. Such treatment may enable the person to get by without operation. In many cases what is bad is that, with the dilation of the veins, the many little valves in the vessels—valves which help to hold up the column of blood—stretch out and become ineffective; they no longer do their job.

Big Brown Area
 Sometimes, when the venous circulation in the lower part of the leg is bad the person gets a big brown area near the inner side of the ankle, and eventually an ulcer may form there. This may refuse to heal permanently. Fifty years ago, when I was an intern, we used to see any number of such ulcers in old people. We would clean them up and then cover them with skin-grafts.

In many cases an expert will operate and take out the dilated vein. He may also tie the big vein of the thigh where it enters the groin. This operation causes the venous blood to go up through veins buried in the muscles of the legs and thighs. These muscles support the veins and help the circulation by their repeated contractions during walking.

Some physicians inject the veins with a drug which tends to cause an inflammation. Then, if the walls of the vein stick together, it may become obliterated. Unfortunately, there are some risks to this type of treatment, and it often fails to give results. Hence, most experts prefer to remove the bad vein surgically.
