Ice Age Hunters Roamed Into America From Asia

Science is beaming a spotlight on the dim first families of America—the Ice Age nomadic hunters whose desperate lives are glimpsed in bones and primitive weapons.

Over 20,000 years ago they came from Siberia to Alaska and groped southward through glacial mists, subsisting partly on now-extinct animals of appalling size and ferocity.

Their way of life and migrations as pieced together by the scientists using atomic-age tools are disclosed by Thomas R. Henry.

The firstcomers used their weapons with considerable skill. With crude clubs and spears they killed "some of the fiercest and most powerful animals the world has ever known."

Some mammoths set upon by the spear-wielding hunters stood 13 feet at the shoulders. Long tusks curled 16 feet. A full-grown bison may have weighed 2,250 pounds. The horns of one species, tip to tip, were six feet apart. That such beasts were assailed by the earliest migrants is attested by weapons found amidst the animals' bones.

It is unlikely that the hunters used arrows. The bow came much later.

Mastodons and mammoths, perhaps, were attacked while bogged in sloughs. "As for the bison, the hunters doubtless dressed themselves in wolf skins and lay in wait on the slopes of waterholes," the author says. Lurking wolves were taken for granted by the bison; perhaps the hunters mimicked wolf howls to enhance the deception.

The hunt, in the absence of agriculture, was the nomads' livelihood. Game animals gave them weapons, food, clothing and shelter.

Their ornaments were beads of lignite, tubular bone beads and probably pendants fashioned laboriously from red hematite. While appreciating beauty by their standards, Ice Age men left artifacts that show carelessness, short-cuts, and work unfinished.

Feminine ensemble probably consisted of short shaggy skirts and a few beads. Needlelike relics suggest that the women could sew. The roamings of the dawn man in the Western world, from Alaska to Cape Horn, have bequeathed tell-tale souvenirs: a 9,000-year-old basket from Dangle Cave, Utah, earliest found in the New World; sandals of the same period from Fort Rock Cave, Oregon; 23,800-year-old charcoal from Tule Springs, Nevada; triangular-shaped blades 10,500-years-old from Gypsum Cave, Nevada; a 20,000-year-old female skeleton from Pelican Rapids, Minn.; a skull 12,000-years-old from Midland, Tex.; a human skeleton in the same stratum with bones of the mastodon and extinct horse from Minas Gerais, Brazil.

"Perhaps we shall never know... when the first Asian hunter walked into the new hunting grounds of North America," Henry says, "but we have learned a little about these first Americans... and, slowly, the scientists here and there may continue to clear away some of the mist."

WALL STREET
New York — (U.P.) — Stocks turned irregular today after a three-day rise had carried utilities to a record high, industries to a new high since April 13, 1931, and rails to their best since Dec. 8.

Railroad issues, star performers yesterday on a 6 per cent freight rate increase, declined on profit taking. Southern Railway, Delaware & Hudson, and Union Pacific down a point or more each, led the decline. Mahoning Coal Railroad fell seven to 578 in the high priced group. Seaboard met realizing following a two for one stock split. Steels eased small amounts.
