Spoon Bread

Rich and elegant fare is the gold brown soufflé-like hot bread called spoon bread. And it is one of the most justly famous of all Southern dishes. But it came from humble beginnings. The Indian's corn pone was adopted by the colonists who called it ash cake and later hoe cake because it was laid on the metal part of a hoe and baked over coals.

The South's Negro cooks, more than anyone else, were responsible for the evolution from the Indian's corn pone, and the corn meal mush fed to field hands, to the luxuriously rich spoon bread that became the pride of the manor house.

GAMBILL'S PLANTATION SPOON BREAD MIX now makes it possible to prepare this delicious dish, with all its old time goodness, but with new convenience and speed. It's a complete mix, add only water and it's available only at Bill Fontaine's Hawthorne Market, 534 East Main. It's another of the many exclusive foods at this East Main food store.
