He told the group that to make life a balanced, well-rounded experience, an individual should be sure that the basic needs of life are met. These basic needs are physical needs such as food, clothing and warmth, mental stimuli and knowledge, emotional needs—the need to be loved and respected and the spiritual needs through worship.

He also said that every one should show appreciation to others and should cultivate and respond to the personalities of close associates.

She said one should be responsive to the simple things of life, should meet problems with decision—decide and then forget, and should make the present moment the most important, not events of the past or future.
