The Medical Roundup

by Walter Alvarez Emeritus Consultant in Medicine, Mayo Clinic Emeritus Professor of Medicine, Mayo Foundation

A CHANGING PSYCHIATRY In the early years of psychiatry doctors studied insane and neurotic persons; they described their symptoms, they tried to classify their troubles, they recognized the fact that nervous diseases are inherited, and they did what they could in practical ways to help their patients.

Dr. Bailey wisely objected, also, to the use of a long series of electro-shock treatments in cases in which this treatment is not indicated and hence does no good. He knows that some psychiatrists have largely given up talking to their patients. They just put them upon the table and start giving them shock treatments.

Then came Freud with a lot of theories, some of them queer and highly improbable, and some of them unprovable. He assumed that mental troubles are due to sexual conflicts in early childhood. Some of these ideas were so weird that even Freud's closest followers could not stomach them.

Unduly Large Influence Although the analysts make up only a small group among psychiatrists, by hanging together and by writing in such a way as to catch the ear of the public, they have had an unduly large influence on psychiatry and on the thought of the world.

Under the surface, rebellious feelings have long been gathering, and at last they have come out. The more conservative and really scientific psychiatrists are now joining with the new physiologic or laboratory research psychiatrists to build a new science of psychiatry.

At the recent meeting most vocal of the attack on the status quo was made by able Dr. Percival Bailey, of the University of Illinois. He objected to several things that he feels are wrong with modern psychiatry.
