Manned Rocket Flight To Moon in 15 Years Said Purpose of New Corporation

Los Angeles—(U.P.)—A manned rocked flight to the moon in 15 years is the primary purpose of a new corporation headed by one of the world's leading missile authorities.

Dr. John L. Barnes hailed formation of Systems Laboratories Corp., of which he is president, as "the beginning of the space age."

Barnes, professor of engineering at UCLA and instrumental in developing the nation's intercontinental missile systems, the "Navajo" and ICBM, Monday announced formation of "the first professional scientific organization in the United States designed expressly to do research and development in the field of interplanetary space travel."

Conquest Possible

The first goal—"overcoming the technical obstacles that still stand in the way of man's first flight to the moon."

Barnes declared that "the conquest of outer space has already become a practical possibility that can be achieved within five to 15 years of intensive scientific and engineering work."

Barnes displayed a small model of the proposed moon missile. The main rocket, resembling a huge tank tapered and rounded at one end, would be nuclear powered. It would be surrounded by four chemically-powered booster rockets, nearly as long as the main rocket, which would be released after the unit was under way. The nuclear rocket would continue alone to the moon.

Barnes pointed to development of the atomic submarine and work now under way on the first atomic aircraft. He said nuclear rocket propulsion "can be made practical fairly soon."

Effective Power Source

He said there are chemical rocket propulsion units now capable of taking a missile from the earth but that nuclear rocket propulsion is considered the "most effective source of power for space-cruising."

Barnes said the proposed nuclear rocket would be about 100 feet long. In leaving earth, it would have to be speeded to about seven miles a second, the "escape velocity" from earth. After leaving earth on its journey of about 242,000 miles, it would continue at about the same speed. Barnes said, since no greater speed would be needed for an earth-moon hop.

Barnes outlined a three-stage plan: first, a rocket would be sent on a nonstop roundtrip carrying only instruments. Then a flight would carry animals. Finally a crew of two men would circle the moon and return to earth.
