American Markets Differ, British Exporters Informed

London (U.P.)—The British government is advising exporters that American men prefer to buy goods colored either black or red.

And some British merchandise is "too good" to sell in the United States, it says here.

Don't make the stuff so durable, British manufacturers are officially counseled. In the United States, they are told, "purchases are expected not to last for a lifetime, but until the next change of fashion."

The inside information for the British businessman is contained in a book-thick pamphlet compiled by the staff of Her Majesty's Embassy in Washington. The title is "Economic and Commercial Conditions in the U.S.A."

In America, the report says, "goods are bought, not sold." It explains at the outset that Americans are "amazingly wealthy."

"American wealth has long been proverbial and, although today it may not be so easy to become a millionaire as it used to be, recent increases in income have been impressive."

Contrast Great

It's a funny country.

"The contrast between the Pacific Northwest and Texas is as great as that between Britain and Sicily," the pamphlet reports.

"There is no single American market but a series of regional markets."

"The American purchase, who is generally a woman, is much influenced by fashion. Fashions change quickly and out-of-date merchandise cannot be sold except at giveaway prices."

"Again, the American consumer is demanding, and will not buy anything unless it is just right."

"Once a manufacturer popularizes some labor-saving improvement, his competitors must follow suit or go out of business."

goods." But it lists two market areas where British salesmen can keep American boys and their daddies for customers without worry.

1. "Some traditional toys (e.g., lead soldiers) are in constant demand and sell well with no alteration in design.

2. "Exports of whisky to the United States have been limited only by the ability of the distillers to provide sufficient quantities for the market. Shipments are sold from the ship's side."

"Then merchandise must look well.

"Good design is appreciated, especially lightness, simplicity and functional line. United Kingdom goods, from machinery to textiles, are often criticized for being too heavy—or even too good—for the use for which they were designed.

"Attention must be paid to color as a lure to the potential buyer. Thus, for articles that are of interest to men (machinery, for example) black and red are generally favored.

"Pastel shades are preferred for women's goods.

"Colors in general are brighter and sunnier than in England. "Durability, though of value in industrial equipment, is not important in consumer goods where purchases are not expected to last for a lifetime, but until the next change of fashion.

"The American purchaser is not blind to quality; but for him (or her), quality resides more in style, design and convenience than in durability."

The report discerns nothing that British doggedness cannot conquer in the "admittedly difficult American market." If the Englishman "brings vigor and imagination to back up the quality, style and price of his
