Heredity Clinics Possibility In Next Century

By ELIZABETH TOOMEY

New York—UPI—Before the turn of the next century married couples will be able to go to heredity clinics for information about their children as readily as they consult medical clinics for family illness.

The age-old question of mothers, "Is my baby all right?" will be preceded in thousands of cases by the anxious query, "What are my chances of having a normal baby?"

Doctors especially trained in genetics will be able to predict, with increasing accuracy, whether a child is likely to inherit family illness or deformity.

These forecasts come from a small group of pioneering scientists already active in 13 heredity counseling centers started in the United States in the past 15 years.

The counseling centers, operated in connection with university medical schools, are little known to the general public. They do not counsel by mail and have dealt largely with heredity questions referred to them by doctors.

Soon Available
"In the next two generations heredity clinics will be available to the general public in the same proportion that other specialized medical care is available to them," predicted Dr. Gordon Allen, one of a dozen American doctors with graduate training in genetics and the first full time geneticist employed by the U.S. government.

Recently the American Eugenics Society published a booklet called "Heredity Counseling, Its Services And Centers" to let parents know what progress has been made so far. The booklet, sold for 25 cents, also lists the locations of counseling centers in the United States, Canada and 11 other countries.

"Abnormalities and defects used to be considered an act of God," the booklet stated, punishment for sin or a cross to be borne with stoicism, and some of this distorted folklore still carries over. The good news today is that it is now possible to offer heredity counseling about the chances of certain kinds of inherited defects and disorders appearing in your children.

Simple Answers
Some questions are simple to answer, some are tragic and many still are medical mysteries. Parents ask heredity counselors if their children will inherit allergies.

There is "a certain heredity factor" in allergies, Dr. Franz J. Kallman, psychiatrist who heads the department of medical genetics at the New York State Psychiatric Institute, reported, "but the environment factor is very important."

One girl asked if she should marry the boy she loved because his twin brother had tried to commit suicide. She had heard that suicidal tendencies ran in families, with twins especially likely to share such tendencies. The heredity counselor reassured her that suicide impulses are not inherited.

Tables have been worked out to show the likelihood for children to inherit such diseases as epilepsy and such deformities as club foot or harelip.
