Age of Science Catching Up With Green Pea; Drastic Changes Due

BY DELOS SMITH
United Press Science Editor

New York—(UP)—Our age of science and technology has caught up with the green pea. The way things stack up, some rather drastic changes are in store for it.

According to Donald W. Barton, plant scientist at the New York State Agricultural Experiment Station, no one—absolutely no one—enjoys shelling peas out of their pods.

That made it a prime target in the relentless march of technology. Fresh peas are disappearing from the markets. Frozen peas and canned peas taste as good—and they're shelled by machines.

In 1939, Barton said, more than 100,000 acres across the country were devoted to growing peas for housewives to shell. By 1954, the last year with a complete statistic, there were only 7,000 acres.

Acreage Increases

Meanwhile, the acreage devoted to peas for freezing shot up from 27,000 to 102,000, and that for peas for canning made similar gains. But all this would make no difference to the pea if there weren't some complications.

These complications center around the fact that peas which are ideal for selling to the consumer when garden fresh, are far from ideal for efficient freezing and canning on a mass production basis.

Those peas mature on the vine over a considerable period. The grower can pick his patch a number of times and supply vegetable markets for weeks. Furthermore, the pods are large and the peas are not very firmly attached inside. That makes shelling easier for the housewife.

But the ideal peas for the freezer and canner are peas which mature all at once. No pea patch is picked more than once, and then by machine. The pods should be smallish, with peas tightly packed inside. The shelling machines work much more efficiently with that kind of pod.

So here is where Barton and his fellow plant scientists come in. They're breeding the pea of the future which will conform in every detail to the machines which gather it, shell it, scald it, and can or freeze it.

Root Rot Fought

There are varieties of peas right now which are suitable for freezing and canning, of course. But they have their faults which scientists are confident they can eliminate in time.

For instance, all varieties of peas are subject to root rots and some are susceptible to virus disease. But the technology involving machines and factories can't tolerate "bad years" when short supply makes capital investment idle.

Right now the New York experiment station is crossing wild peas from the Middle East, which are hardly fit to eat, with the succulent domestic varieties that are welcome on every table. The foreigners are highly resistant to rot and disease, however. The scientific problem is to breed in the good qualities of each parent and breed out the bad.
