'Flying Flapjack' On Official Flight

Edwards Air Force Base, Calif. — (U.P.) — An official "flying saucer" has made its initial flight but the disc-shaped structure was attached to an airplane.

The new "Flying Flapjack" is attached to a Navy WV2 super constellation built by Lockheed Aircraft Corp. It was described as resembling a flying saucer which has captured an airplane as it underwrote the flight test yesterday.

The 30-foot disc mounted atop the fuselage looks like a parasol. Actually it contains the most important part of the plane, a distance determining radar antenna.

The plane was built for the Navy to test advanced ideas in flying radar stations. The super-constellation is powered by four turbo-compound piston engines and was designed as a flying radar station to guard the nation against a surprise air attack.

Roy Wimmer, Lockheed test pilot kept the odd-looking plane in the air for an hour over this test center. Lockheed technicians described the test "definitely successful."

Dr. Gordon C. Edwards, acting state health officer, said the department's prediction that polio has started its annual increase of mid-summer.

The new cases occurred in Benton, Clackamas, Gilliam, Malheur, Multnomah and Umatilla counties. Four cases were paralytic.

Dr. Edwards urged Oregonians in all age groups to avail themselves of vaccine supplies before the peak of the polio season is reached in September and October.

First Steam Locomotive Frightened Spectators, Horses 125 Years Ago Today

Albany, N.Y. — (U.P.) — A hulking smoking iron beast roared through the countryside between here and Schenectady, N.Y., 125 years ago today. It couldn't have caused much less excitement than an invasion from Mars.

The monster, coughing clouds of smoke and sparks, was the first steam locomotive to draw a passenger train in the United States. It scared crew, passengers, spectators and horses in the fields.

The first passenger locomotive, the DeWitt Clinton, was a quaint affair of iron, weighing slightly more than three tons. It was less than 12 feet long—about the length of a modern automobile—and huffed along on only four wheels.

The engineer and fireman stood in the open, balancing gingerly on a dangerously narrow platform. Passengers were not any more comfortable—or safe.

They rode in two ordinary stage coach bodies, slung on special frames with flanged wheels to keep them on the track. They were at the mercy of fiery pine embers from the smokestack and of the track itself.

That first 15 miles of primitive track between the two cities

Brink's Trial Slowed By Defense Tactics

Boston — (U.P.) — Defense challenges, which have blocked any admittance to the jury box, stymied progress in the trial of eight men accused of looting a Brink's money vault of $1,219,000 six years ago.

A total of 39 prospective jurors, 19 of them Wednesday, have been challenged by attorneys defending the men charged with the nation's biggest cash robbery.

In all, nearly 200 veniremen have been disqualified since jury selection began Tuesday. The steady volley of defense challenges was expected to delay trial testimony for at least two weeks.

Only a handful of spectators have appeared at the grey, brick Suffolk County Courthouse despite the sensational pre-trial publicity. Heat and monotonous legal exchanges drove all but three from Wednesday's session.
