Backstairs: Concerned Over Shrubbery

By MERRIMAN SMITH
United Press White House
Writer

Gettysburg, Pa. — (U.P.) — Backstairs at the campaign White House:

Mrs. Eisenhower was happy to have all the Republican leaders here for a pep talk yesterday. But she was concerned that the enthusiastic GOP partisans might overrun some of her fine shrubbery around the farm.

As a result, Treasury guards who are assigned to the protection of the Eisenhower house saw to it that the visitors did not stray from the well-outlined paths.

The Eisenhowers took a dim view of digging latrines about their farm for the many visitors this week. Instead, Government toilet trailers usually used at big events around Washington were wheeled into position at Gettysburg.

Tourists have seen White House gardeners digging in the south grounds of the executive mansion recently. No reason for alarm. There was one theory that a new air raid shelter was under construction. Truth of the matter is that the men who tend the spacious White House grounds decided that this was the best time of year to do lawn re-seeding and re-seeding.

More men and women from the information field—press, radio and television—covered the GOP clambake up here yesterday than had ever before followed the President out of town during Mr. Eisenhower's White House career.

Shortly before the President spoke in the tent outside his farmhouse, Press Secretary James C. Hagerty did not know just how long Mr. Eisenhower would address himself to the subject of producing a big GOP vote in November.

"I suppose, about 15 minutes," Hagerty said, "but honestly, I just don't know."

Recent and early cool days have given the fairways of the Gettysburg County Club golf course an early season glossy look. Good bet: Mr. Eisenhower will try out the nine-hole layout before very long.

Security around the Eisenhower farm is a matter of concentric circles. If he is not resident at the time, a tourist may motor quite close to the white farm house. But if the President is on the grounds, he is stopped some distance from the central area of the farm by Treasury guards and Secret Service agents.

Relatively sure bets on Eisenhower movements during the next few months: back to the Pacific Coast, a stop of several days in Colorado, and probably a post-election golfing session in Augusta, Ga.

A Nichol's Worth of . . . Comment On This and That

By HARMAN W. NICHOLS
United Press Feature Writer

Washington — (U.P.) — Some newspaper reporters are notorious misspellers and one of the words they misspell most often is "misspell."

I am quoting W. Maclean Johnson, who is out with a pamphlet called "New Goals in Spelling." I did a little piece on the book-let and maybe it prompted publisher Johnson to page newspaper editors to see how smart reporters are.

A survey was what it was, actually, and sometimes surveys are suspect.

Anyway, the end result was that editors of big papers and wire services are caustic about spelling errors.

Younger Men Poorer Spellers "To a man," Johnson said in his final analysis, "editors are agreed that younger newspaper men are poorer spellers than older newspaper men—in spite of perhaps more education."

That is some comfort to us old hands.

The editors, mostly, said they considered spelling to be very important in a newsman. Almost vital. And that is leaving out what us old timers used to say: "What is a copydesk for?"

Two-thirds of the editors said that poor spelling would hold back a newspaperman who otherwise was bright-eyed and able.

It is hard to believe, but the editors listed these words as those most often misspelled by writers and reporters:

Marshal, accommodate, consensus, separate, embarrass, occurred, principle and principal, dependent, hemorrhage, weird, parallel, veterinarian, commitment, affidavit, and misspell.

Note from UP copy desk: Nick is so right. In writing the above paragraph, he spelled it "concentus."

Rebuttal from Nichols: Like I said, what is a copydesk for? A lot of the editors made special comments, such as:

FOUL FEEDER SENTENCED

Newark, N.J. — (U.P.) — Mrs. Dorothy Peterson ran afoul Wednesday of a city ordinance that's strictly for the birds. She was convicted and given a suspended sentence for feeding birds on the ground outside her home. Cited was a little-known ordinance which prohibits feeding birds or animals "in such a manner that the food is scattered upon the ground and allowed to remain there where it is accessible to rats."
